CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 4, 1893.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Fifty-third Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

The VICE-PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, of the State of Illinois), called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

PRAYER.

Rev. W. H. MILBURN, Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

We devoutly bless Thee, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, that Thou has brought back in safety and in health to their seats upon this floor so many of the members of this time-honored and illustrious body. And we now beseech Thee to grant them Thy grace, with health of body and soundness of mind, for their arduous and responsible duties, enacting laws and making provision for the welfare of this great nation. Prosper them in all their ways. Let Thy heavenly benediction abide upon our land, upon all our people. May intelligence, virtue, patriotism, and piety increase among our families and throughout all the land, that God's smile may be upon our country and Thy grace be the portion of our descendants to the latest generation. We humbly pray, through Jesus Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MCPHERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MCPHERSON and Mr. SHERMAN were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. FAULKNER, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. HARRIS (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

I am further directed to inform the Senate that a committee of three members has been appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed by the Senate to wait on the President and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may have to make; and that the Speaker has appointed as the said committee on the part of the House, Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. OUTHWAITE, and Mr. BURROWS.

RECESS.

Mr. HARRIS (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MCPHERSON and Mr. SHERMAN, the committee appointed in conjunction with a similar committee of the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and

Mr. MCPHERSON said: Mr. President, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, have performed that duty and have been requested by the President to say that he will immediately communicate to each House a message in writing.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

At 1 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m. Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received from the secretary, and handed to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary (Mr. WILLIAM R. COX) read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The constitutional duty which requires the President from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, is fittingly entered upon by commending to the Congress a careful examination of the detailed statements and well-supported recommendations contained in the reports of the heads of Departments, who are chiefly charged with the executive work of the Government. In an effort to abridge this communication as much as is consistent with its purpose, I shall supplement a brief reference to the contents of these departmental reports by the mention of such executive business and incidents as are not embraced therein, and by such recommendations as appear to be at this particular time appropriate.

While our foreign relations have not at all times during the past year been entirely free from perplexity, no embarrassing situation remains that will not yield to the spirit of fairness and love of justice, which, joined with consistent firmness, characterize a truly American foreign policy.

My predecessor having accepted the office of arbitrator of the long-standing missions boundary dispute tendered to the President by the Argentine Republic and Brazil, it has been my agreeable duty to receive the special envoys commissioned by those states to lay before me evidence and arguments in behalf of their respective governments.

The outbreak of domestic hostilities in the Republic of Brazil found the United States alert to watch the interests of our citizens in that country, with which we carry on important commerce. Several vessels of our new Navy are now, and for some time have been, stationed at Rio de Janeiro. The struggle being between the established government, which controls the machinery of administration and with which we maintain friendly relations, and certain officers of the navy employing the vessels of their command in an attack upon the national capital and chief seaport, and lacking, as it does, the elements of divided administration, I have failed to see that the insurgents can reasonably claim recognition as belligerents.

Thus far the position of our Government has been that of an attentive but impartial observer of the unfortunate conflict. Emphasizing our fixed policy of impartial neutrality in such a condition of affairs as now exists, I deemed it necessary to disavow, in a manner not to be misunderstood, the unauthorized action of our late naval commander in those waters in saluting the revolted Brazilian admiral, being indisposed to countenance an act calculated to give gratuitous sanction to the local insurrection.

The convention between our Government and Chile, having for its object the settlement and adjustment of the demands of the two countries against each other, has been made effective by the organization of the claims commission provided for. The two Governments failing to agree upon the third member of the commission, the good offices of the president of the Swiss Republic were invoked, as provided in the treaty, and the selection of the Swiss representative in this country to complete the organization was gratifying alike to the United States and Chile.

The vexatious question of so-called legation asylum for offenders against the state and its laws was presented anew in Chile by the unauthorized action of the late United States minister in receiving into his official residence two persons who had just failed in an attempt at revolution and against whom criminal charges were pending growing out of a former abortive disturbance. The doctrine of asylum as applied to this case is not sanctioned by the best precedents and, when allowed, tends to encourage sedition and strife. Under no circumstances can the representatives of this Government be permitted, under the ill-defined fiction of extraterritoriality, to interrupt the administration of criminal justice in the countries to which they are accredited. A temperate demand having been made by the Chilean Government for the correction of this conduct in the instance mentioned, the minister was instructed no longer to harbor the offenders.

The legislation of last year, known as the Geary law, requiring the registration of all Chinese laborers entitled to residence in the United States, and the deportation of all not complying with the provisions of the act within the time prescribed, met with much opposition from Chinamen in this country. Acting upon the advice of eminent counsel that the law was unconstitutional, the great mass of Chinese laborers, pending judicial inquiry as to its validity, in good faith declined to apply for the certificates required by its provisions. A test case upon proceeding by habeas corpus was brought before the Supreme Court, and on May 15, 1893, a decision was made by that tribunal sustaining the law.

It is believed that under the recent amendment of the act extending the time for registration, the Chinese laborers thereto entitled, who desire to reside in this country, will now avail themselves of the renewed privilege thus afforded of establishing by lawful procedure their right to remain, and that thereby the necessity of enforced deportation may to a great degree be avoided.

It has devolved upon the United States minister at Peking, as dean of the diplomatic body, and in the absence of a representative of Sweden and Norway, to press upon the Chinese Government reparation for the recent murder of Swedish missionaries at Sung-pu. This question is of vital interest to all countries whose citizens engage in missionary work in the interior.

By Article XII of the General Act of Brussels, signed July 2, 1890, for the suppression of the slave trade and the restriction of certain injurious commerce in the Independent State of the Congo and in the adjacent zone of central Africa, the United States and the other signatory powers agreed to adopt appropriate means for the punishment of persons selling arms and ammunition to the natives and for the confiscation of the inhibited articles. It being the plain duty of this Government to aid in suppressing the nefarious traffic, impairing as it does the praiseworthy and civilizing efforts now in progress in that region, I recommend that an act be passed prohibiting the sale of arms and intoxicants to natives in the regulated zone by our citizens.

Costa Rica has lately testified its friendliness by surrendering to the United States, in the absence of a convention of extradition, but upon duly submitted evidence of criminality, a noted fugitive from justice. It is trusted that the negotiation of a treaty with that country to meet recurring cases of this kind will soon be accomplished. In my opinion treaties for reciprocal extradition should be concluded with all those countries with which the United States has not already conventional arrangements of that character.

I have deemed it fitting to express to the Governments of Costa Rica and Colombia the kindly desire of the United States to see their pending boundary dispute finally closed by arbitration in conformity with the spirit of the treaty concluded between them some years ago.

Our relations with the French Republic continue to be intimate and cordial. I sincerely hope that the extradition treaty with that country, as amended by the Senate, will soon be operative.

While occasional questions affecting our naturalized citizens returning to the land of their birth have arisen in our intercourse with Germany, our relations with that country continue satisfactory.

The questions affecting our relations with Great Britain have been treated in a spirit of friendliness.

Negotiations are in progress between the two Governments with a view to such concurrent action as will make the award and regulations agreed upon by the Bering Sea Tribunal of Arbitration practically effective; and it is not doubted that Great Britain will coöperate freely with this country for the accomplishment of that purpose.

The dispute growing out of the discriminating tolls imposed in the Welland Canal, upon cargoes of cereals bound to and from the lake ports of the United States, was adjusted by the substitution of a more equitable schedule of charges, and my predecessor thereupon suspended his proclamation imposing discriminating tolls upon British transit through our canals.

A request for additions to the list of extraditable offenses covered by the existing treaty between the two countries is under consideration.

During the past year an American citizen, employed in a subordinate commercial position in Haiti, after suffering a protracted imprisonment on an unfounded charge of smuggling, was finally liberated on judicial examination. Upon urgent representation to the Haitian Government, a suitable indemnity was paid to the sufferer.

By a law of Haiti, a sailing vessel, having discharged her cargo, is refused clearance until the duties on such cargo have been paid. The hardship of this measure upon American shipowners who conduct the bulk of the carrying trade of that country has been insisted on with a view of securing the removal of this cause of complaint.

Upon receiving authentic information of the firing upon an American mail steamer touching at the port of Amapala, because her captain refused to deliver up a passenger in transit from Nicaragua to Guatemala upon demand of the military authorities of Honduras, our minister to that country under instructions protested against the wanton act and demanded satisfaction. The Government of Honduras, actuated by a sense of justice, and in a spirit of the utmost friendship, promptly disavowed the illegal conduct of its officers, and expressed sincere regret for the occurrence.

It is confidently anticipated that a satisfactory adjustment will soon be reached of the questions arising out of the seizure and use of American vessels by insurgents in Honduras and the subsequent denial by the successful government of commercial privileges to those vessels on that account.

A notable part of the southeasterly coast of Liberia between the Cavally and San Pedro Rivers, which for nearly half a century has been generally recognized as belonging to that Republic by cession and purchase, has been claimed to be under the protectorate of France in virtue of agreements entered into by the native tribes over whom Liberia's control has not been well maintained.

More recently, negotiations between the Liberian representative and the French Government resulted in the signature at Paris of a treaty whereby as an adjustment certain Liberian territory is ceded to France. This convention at last advices had not been ratified by the Liberian legislature and executive.

Feeling a sympathetic interest in the fortunes of the little commonwealth, the establishment and development of which were largely aided by the benevolence of our countrymen, and which constitutes the only independently sovereign state on the west coast of Africa, this Government has suggested to the French Government its earnest concern lest territorial impairment in Liberia should take place without her unconstrained consent.

Our relations with Mexico continue to be of that close and friendly nature which should always characterize the intercourse of two neighboring republics.

The work of relocating the monuments marking the boundary between the two countries from Paso del Norte to the Pacific is now nearly completed.

The commission recently organized under the conventions of 1884 and 1889 it is expected will speedily settle disputes growing out of the shifting currents of the Rio Grande River east of El Paso.

Nicaragua has recently passed through two revolutions, the party at first successful having in turn been displaced by another. Our newly appointed minister, by his timely good offices, aided in a peaceful adjustment of the controversy involved in the first conflict. The large American interests established in that country in connection with the Nicaragua Canal were not molested.

The canal company has, unfortunately, become financially seriously embarrassed, but a generous treatment has been extended to it by the Government of Nicaragua. The United States are especially interested in the successful achievement of the vast undertaking this company has in charge. That it should be accomplished under distinctively American auspices, and its enjoyment assured not only to the vessels of this country as a channel of communication between our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, but to the ships of the world in the interests of civilization, is a proposition which, in my judgment, does not admit of question.

Guatemala has also been visited by the political vicissitudes which have afflicted her Central American neighbors; but the dissolution of its legislature and the proclamation of a dictatorship have been unattended with civil war.

An extradition treaty with Norway has recently been exchanged and proclaimed.

The extradition treaty with Russia, signed in March, 1887, and amended and confirmed by the Senate in February last, was duly proclaimed last June.

Led by a desire to compose differences and contribute to the restoration of order in Samoa, which for some years previous had been the scene of conflicting foreign pretensions and native strife, the United States, departing from its policy consecrated by a century of observance, entered four years ago into the treaty of Berlin, thereby becoming jointly bound with England and Germany to establish and maintain Malietoa Laupepa as King of Samoa. The treaty provided for a foreign court of justice; a municipal council for the district of Apia, with a foreign president thereof, authorized to advise the king; a tribunal for the settlement of native and foreign land titles, and a revenue system for the kingdom. It entailed upon the three powers that part of the cost of the new government not met by the revenue of the islands.

Early in the life of this triple protectorate the native dissensions it was designed to quell revived. Rivals defied the authority of the new king, refusing to pay taxes and demanding the election of a ruler by native suffrage. Mataafa, an aspirant to the throne, and a large number of his native adherents were in open rebellion on one of the islands. Quite lately, at the request of the other powers, and in fulfillment of its treaty obligation, this Government agreed to unite in a joint military movement of such dimensions as would probably secure the surrender of the insurgents without bloodshed.

The war ship Philadelphia was accordingly put under orders for Samoa, but before she arrived the threatened conflict was precipitated by King Malietoa's attack upon the insurgent camp. Mataafa was defeated and a number of his men killed. The British and German naval vessels present subsequently secured the surrender of Mataafa and his adherents. The defeated chief and ten of his principal supporters were deported to a German island of the Marshall group, where they are held as prisoners under the joint responsibility and cost of the three powers.

This incident and the events leading up to it signally illustrate the impolicy of entangling alliances with foreign powers.

More than fifteen years ago this Government preferred a claim against Spain, in behalf of one of our citizens, for property seized and confiscated in Cuba. In 1886 the claim was adjusted, Spain agreeing to pay, unconditionally, as a fair indemnity, $1,500,000. A respectful but earnest note was recently addressed to the Spanish Government insisting upon prompt fulfillment of its long-neglected obligation.

Other claims preferred by the United States against Spain in behalf of American citizens for property confiscated in Cuba have been pending for many years.

At the time Spain's title to the Caroline Islands was confirmed by arbitration, that government agreed that the rights which had been acquired there by American missionaries should be recognized and respected. It is sincerely hoped that this pledge will be observed by allowing our missionaries, who were removed from Ponape to a place of safety by a United States war ship during the late troubles between the Spanish garrison and the natives, to return to their field of usefulness.

The reproduced caravel, Santa Maria, built by Spain and sent to the Columbian Exposition, has been presented to the United States in token of amity and in commemoration of the event it was designed to celebrate. I recommend that, in accepting this gift, Congress make grateful recognition of the sincere friendship which prompted it.

Important matters have demanded attention in our relations with the Ottoman Porte.

The firing and partial destruction, by an unrestrained mob, of one of the school buildings of Anatolia College, established by citizens of the United States at Marsovan, and the apparent indifference of the Turkish Government to the outrage, notwithstanding the complicity of some of its officials, called for earnest remonstrance, which was followed by promises of reparation and punishment of the offenders.

Indemnity for the injury to the buildings has already been paid, permission to rebuild given, registration of the school property in the name of the American owners secured, and efficient protection guaranteed.

Information received of maltreatment suffered by an inoffensive American woman engaged in missionary work in Turkish Koordistan was followed by such representations to the Porte as resulted in the issuance of orders for the punishment of her assailants, the removal of a delinquent official, and the adoption of measures for the protection of our citizens engaged in mission and other lawful work in that quarter.

Turkey complains that her Armenian subjects obtain citizenship in this country, not to identify themselves in good faith with our people, but with the intention of returning to the land of their birth and there engaging in sedition. This complaint is not wholly without foundation. A journal published in this country in the Armenian language openly counsels its readers to arm, organize, and participate in movements for the subversion of Turkish authority in the Asiatic provinces. The Ottoman Government has announced its intention to expel from its dominions Armenians who have obtained naturalization in the United States since 1868.

The right to exclude any or all classes of aliens is an attribute of sovereignty. It is a right asserted and, to a limited extent, enforced by the United States, with the sanction of our highest court. There being no naturalization treaty between the United States and Turkey, our minister at Constantinople has been instructed that, while recognizing the right of that Government to enforce its declared policy against naturalized Armenians, he is expected to protect them from unnecessary harshness of treatment.

In view of the impaired financial resources of Venezuela, consequent upon the recent revolution there, a modified arrangement for the satisfaction of the awards of the late revisory claims commission, in progressive installments, has been assented to, and payments are being regularly made thereunder.

The boundary dispute between Venezuela and British Guiana is yet unadjusted. A restoration of diplomatic intercourse between that Republic and Great Britain and reference of the question to impartial arbitration would be a most gratifying consummation.

The ratification by Venezuela of the convention for the arbitration of the long-deferred claim of the Venezuelan Transportation Company is awaited.

It is hardly necessary for me to state that the questions arising from our relations with Hawaii have caused serious embarrassment. Just prior to the installation of the present Administration the existing Government of Hawaii had been suddenly overthrown, and a treaty of annexation had been negotiated between the Provisional Government of the islands and the United States, and submitted to the Senate for ratification. This treaty I withdrew for examination, and dispatched Hon. James H. Blount, of Georgia, to Honolulu as a special commissioner to make an impartial investigation of the circumstances attending the change of government, and of all the conditions bearing upon the subject of the treaty.

After a thorough and exhaustive examination Mr. Blount submitted to me his report, showing beyond all question that the constitutional Government of Hawaii had been subverted with the active aid of our representative to that Government, and through the intimidation caused by the presence of an armed naval force of the United States which was landed for that purpose at the instance of our minister. Upon the facts developed it seemed to me the only honorable course for our Government to pursue was to undo the wrong that had been done by those representing us and to restore as far as practicable the status existing at the time of our forcible intervention. With a view of accomplishing this result within the constitutional limits of executive power, and recognizing all our obligations and responsibilities growing out of any changed conditions brought about by our unjustifiable interference, our present minister at Honolulu has received appropriate instructions to that end. Thus far no information of the accomplishment of any definite results has been received from him.

Additional advices are soon expected. When received they will be promptly sent to the Congress, together with all other information at hand, accompanied by a special Executive message fully detailing all the facts necessary to a complete understanding of the case, and presenting a history of all the material events leading up to the present situation.

By a concurrent resolution, passed by the Senate February 14, 1890, and by the House of Representatives on the 3d of April following, the President was requested "to invite, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration and be peaceably adjusted by such means." April 18, 1890, the International American Conference of Washington, by resolution expressed the wish that all controversies between the republics of America and the nations of Europe might be settled by arbitration, and recommended that the government of each nation represented in that conference should communicate this wish to all friendly powers. A favorable response has been received from Great Britain in the shape of a resolution adopted by Parliament July 16 last, cordially sympathizing with the purpose in view, and expressing the hope that Her Majesty's Government will lend ready coöperation to the Government of the United States upon the basis of the concurrent resolution above quoted.

It affords me signal pleasure to lay this parliamentry resolution before the Congress and to express my sincere gratification that the sentiment of two great and kindred nations is thus authoritatively manifested in favor of the rational and peaceable settlement of international quarrels by honorable resort to arbitration.

Since the passage of the act of March 3, 1893, authorizing the President to raise the grade of our envoys to correspond with the rank in which foreign countries accredit their agents here, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Germany have conferred upon their representatives at this capital the title of ambassador, and I have responded by accrediting the agents of the United States in those countries with the same title. A like elevation of mission is announced by Russia, and when made will be similarly met. This step fittingly comports with the position the United States hold in the family of nations.

During my former administration I took occasion to recommend a revision of the laws relating to the consular service, in order that it might become a more efficient agency in the promotion of the interests it was intended to subserve. The duties and powers of consuls have been expanded with the growing requirements of our foreign trade. Discharging important duties affecting our commerce and American citizens abroad, and in certain countries exercising judicial functions, these officers should be men of character, intelligence, and ability.

Upon proof that the legislation of Denmark secures copyright to American citizens on equal footing with its own, the privileges of our copyright laws have been extended by proclamation to subjects of that country.

The Secretary of the Treasury reports that the receipts of the Government from all sources during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, amounted to $461,716,561.94, and its expenditures to $459,374,674.29. There was collected from customs $205,355,016.73, and from internal revenue $161,027,623.93. Our dutiable imports amounted to $421,856,711, an increase of $52,453,907 over the preceding year, and importations free of duty amounted to $444,544,211, a decrease from the preceding year of $13,455,447. Internal-revenue receipts exceeded those of the preceding year by $7,147,445.32.

The total tax collected on distilled spirits was $94,720,260.55, on manufactured tobacco, $31,889,711.74, and on fermented liquors, $32,548,983.07. We exported merchandise during the year amounting to $847,665,194, a decrease of $182,612,954 from the preceding year. The amount of gold exported was larger than any previous year in the history of the Government, amounting to $108,680,844, and exceeding the amount exported during the preceding year by $58,485,517.

The sum paid from the Treasury for sugar bounty was $9,375,130.88, an increase over the preceding year of $2,033,053.09.

It is estimated upon the basis of present revenue laws that the receipts of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1894, will be $430,121,365.38, and its expenditures $458,121,365.38, resulting in a deficiency of $28,000,000.

On the 1st day of November, 1893, the amount of money of all kinds in circulation, or not included in Treasury holdings, was $1,718,544,682, an increase for the year of $112,404,947. Estimating our population at 67,426,000 at the time mentioned the per capita circulation was $25.49. On the same date there was in the Treasury gold bullion amounting to $96,657,273 and silver bullion which was purchased at a cost of $126,261,553.

The purchases of silver under the law of July 14, 1890, during the last fiscal year aggregated 54,008,162.59 fine ounces, which cost $45,531,374.53. The total amount of silver purchased from the time that law became operative until the repeal of its purchasing clause, on the 1st day of November, 1893, was 168,674,590.46 fine ounces, which cost $155,930,940.84. Between the 1st day of March, 1873, and the 1st day of November, 1893, the Government purchased under all laws 503,003,717 fine ounces of silver at a cost of $516,622,948. The silver dollars that have been coined under the act of July 14, 1890, number 36,087,285. The seigniorage arising from such coinage was $6,977,098.39, leaving on hand in the mints 149,699,760 fine ounces of silver, which cost $126,758,218.

Our total coinage of all metals during the last fiscal year consisted of 97,280,875 pieces valued at $43,685,178.80, of which there was $30,038,140 in gold coin, $5,343,715 in silver dollars, $7,217,220.90 in subsidiary silver coin, and $1,086,102.90 in minor coins.

During the calendar year 1892 the production of precious metals in the United States was estimated to be 1,596,375 fine ounces of gold of the commercial and coinage value of $33,000,000, and 58,000,000 fine ounces of silver of the bullion or market value of $50,750,000, and of the coinage value of $74,939,900.

It is estimated that on the 1st day of July, 1893, the metallic stock of money in the United States, consisting of coin and bullion, amounted to $1,213,559,169, of which $597,697,685 was gold, and $615,861,484 was silver.

One hundred and nineteen national banks were organized during the year ending October 31, 1893, with a capital of $11,230,000. Forty-six went into voluntary liquidation and 158 suspended. Sixty-five of the suspended banks were insolvent, 86 resumed business, and 7 remain in the hands of bank examiners, with prospects of speedy resumption. Of the new banks organized 44 were located in the Eastern States, 41 west of the Mississippi River, and 34 in the Central and Southern States. The total number of national banks in existence on the 31st day of October, 1893, was 3,796, having an aggregate capital of $695,558,120. The net increase in the circulation of these banks during the year was $36,836,972.

The recent repeal of the provision of law requiring the purchase of silver bullion by the Government as a feature of our monetary scheme has made an entire change in the complexion of our currency affairs. I do not doubt that the ultimate result of this action will be most salutary and far-reaching. In the nature of things, however, it is impossible to know at this time precisely what conditions will be brought about by the change, or what, if any, supplementary legislation may, in the light of such conditions, appear to be essential or expedient. Of course, after the recent financial perturbation, time is necessary for the reëstablishment of business confidence. When, however, through this restored confidence the money which has been frightened into hoarding places is returned to trade and enterprise, a survey of the situation will probably disclose a safe path leading to a permanently sound currency abundantly sufficient to meet every requirement of our increasing population and business.

In the pursuit of this object we should resolutely turn away from alluring and temporary expedients, determined to be content with nothing less than a lasting and comprehensive financial plan. In these circumstances I am convinced that a reasonable delay in dealing with this subject, instead of being injurious, will increase the probability of wise action.

The Monetary Conference which assembled at Brussels upon our invitation was adjourned to the 30th day of November in the present year. The considerations just stated and the fact that a definite proposition from us seemed to be expected upon the reassembling of the conference, led me to express a willingness to have the meeting still further postponed.

It seems to me that it would be wise to give general authority to the President to invite other nations to such a conference at any time when there should be a fair prospect of accomplishing an international agreement on the subject of coinage.

I desire also to earnestly suggest the wisdom of amending the existing statutes in regard to the issuance of Government bonds. The authority now vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds is not as clear as it should be, and the bonds authorized are disadvantageous to the Government both as to the time of their maturity and rate of interest.

The Superintendent of Immigration, through the Secretary of the Treasury, reports that during the last fiscal year there arrived at our ports 440,793 immigrants. Of these 1,063 were not permitted to land under the limitations of the law, and 577 were returned to the countries from whence they came by reason of their having become public charges. The total arrivals were 141,034 less than for the previous year.

The Secretary in his report gives an account of the operation of the Marine Hospital Service and of the good work done under its supervision in preventing the entrance and spread of contagious diseases.

The admonitions of the last two years touching our public health and the demonstrated danger of the introduction of contagious diseases from foreign ports have invested the subject of national quarantine with increased interest. A more general and harmonious system than now exists, acting promptly and directly everywhere, and constantly operating by preventive means to shield our country from the invasion of disease, and at the same time having due regard to the rights and duties of local agencies, would, I believe, add greatly to the safety of our people.

The Secretary of War reports that the strength of the Army on the 30th day of September last was 25,778 enlisted men and 2,144 officers.

The total expenditures of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1893, amounted to $51,966,074.89. Of this sum, $1,992,581.95 was for salaries and contingent expenses, $23,377,828.35 for the support of the military establishment, $6,077,033.18 for miscellaneous objects, and $20,518,631.41 for public works. This latter sum includes $15,296,876.46 for river and harbor improvements and $3,266,141.20 for fortifications and other works of defense.

The total enrollment of the militia of the several States was, on the 31st of October of the current year, 112,597 officers and enlisted men. The officers of the Army detailed for the inspection and instruction of this reserve of our military force report that increased interest and marked progress are apparent in the discipline and efficiency of the organization.

Neither Indian outbreaks nor domestic violence have called the Army into service during the year, and the only active military duty required of it has been in the Department of Texas, where violations of the neutrality laws of the United States and Mexico were promptly and efficiently dealt with by the troops, eliciting the warm approval of the civil and military authorities of both countries.

The operation of wise laws and the influences of civilization constantly tending to relieve the country from the dangers of Indian hostilities, together with the increasing ability of the States, through the efficiency of the National Guard organizations, to protect their citizens from domestic violence, lead to the suggestion that the time is fast approaching when there should be a reorganization of our Army on the lines of the present necessities of the country. This change contemplates neither increase in number nor added expense, but a redistribution of the force and an encouragement of measures tending to greater efficiency among the men and improvement of the service.

The adoption of battalion formations for infantry regiments, the strengthening of the artillery force, the abandonment of smaller and unnecessary posts, and the massing of the troops at important and accessible stations, all promise to promote the usefulness of the Army. In the judgment of army officers, with but few exceptions, the operation of the law forbidding the reenlistment of men after ten years' service has not proved its wisdom, and while the arguments that led to its adoption were not without merit, the experience of the year constrains me to join in the recommendation for its repeal.

It is gratifying to note that we have begun to attain completed results in the comprehensive scheme of seacoast defense and fortification entered upon eight years ago. A large sum has been already expended, but the cost of maintenance will be inconsiderable as compared with the expense of construction and ordnance. At the end of the current calendar year the War Department will have nine 12-inch, twenty 10-inch, and thirty-four 8-inch guns, ready to be mounted on gun lifts and carriages, and seventy-five 12-inch mortars. In addition to the product of the army gun factory, now completed at Watervliet, the Government has contracted with private parties for the purchase of one hundred guns of these calibers, the first of which should be delivered to the Department for test before July 1, 1894.

The manufacture of heavy ordnance keeps pace with current needs; but to render these guns available for the purposes they are designed to meet, emplacements must be prepared for them. Progress has been made in this direction, and it is desirable that Congress by adequate appropriations should provide for the uninterrupted prosecution of this necessary work.

After much preliminary work and exhaustive examination in accordance with the requirements of the law, the board appointed to select a magazine rifle of modern type with which to replace the obsolete Springfield rifle of the infantry service, completed its labors during the last year, and the work of manufacture is now in progress at the National Armory at Springfield. It is confidently expected that by the end of the current year our infantry will be supplied with a weapon equal to that of the most progressive armies of the world.

The work on the projected Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park has been prosecuted with zeal and judgment, and its opening will be celebrated during the coming year. Over 9 square miles of the Chickamauga battlefield have been acquired, 25 miles of roadway have been constructed, and permanent tablets have been placed at many historical points, while the invitation to the States to mark the positions of their troops participating in the battle has been very generally accepted.

The work of locating and preserving the lines of battle at the Gettysburg battlefield is making satisfactory progress on the plans directed by the last Congress.

The reports of the Military Academy at West Point and the several schools for special instruction of officers, show marked advance in the education of the Army and a commendable ambition among its officers to excel in the military profession and to fit themselves for the highest service to the country.

Under the supervision of Adjt. Gen. Robert Williams, lately retired, the Bureau of Military Information has become well established and is performing a service that will put in possession of the Government in time of war most valuable information, and at all times serve a purpose of great utility in keeping the Army advised of the world's progress in all matters pertaining to the art of war.

The report of the Attorney-General contains the usual summary of the affairs and proceedings of the Department of Justice for the past year, together with certain recommendations as to needed legislation on various subjects. I can not too heartily indorse the proposition that the fee system as applicable to the compensation of United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of Federal courts, and United States commissioners, should be abolished with as little delay as possible. It is clearly in the interest of the community that the business of the courts, both civil and criminal, shall be as small and as inexpensively transacted as the ends of justice will allow.

The system is therefore thoroughly vicious which makes the compensation of court officials depend upon the volume of such business, and thus creates a conflict between a proper execution of the law and private gain, which can not fail to be dangerous to the rights and freedom of the citizen and an irresistible temptation to the unjustifiable expenditure of public funds. If in addition to this reform another was inaugurated which would give to United States commissioners the final disposition of petty offenses within the grade of misdemeanors, especially those coming under the internal-revenue laws, a great advance would be made toward a more decent administration of the criminal law.

In my first message to Congress, dated December 8, 1885, I strongly recommended these changes and referred somewhat at length to the evils of the present system. Since that time the criminal business of the Federal courts and the expense attending it have enormously increased. The number of criminal prosecutions pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States on the 1st day of July, 1885, was 3,808, of which 1,884 were for violations of the internal-revenue laws, while the number of such prosecutions pending on the 1st day of July, 1893, was 9,500, of which 4,200 were for violations of the internal-revenue laws. The expense of the United States courts, exclusive of judges' salaries, for the year ending July 1, 1885, was $2,874,733.11, and for the year ending July 1, 1893, $4,528,676.87.

It is therefore apparent that the reasons given in 1885 for a change in the manner of enforcing the Federal criminal law have gained cogency and strength by lapse of time.

I also heartily join the Attorney-General in recommending legislation fixing degrees of the crime of murder within Federal jurisdiction, as has been done in many of the States; authorizing writs of error on behalf of the Government in cases where final judgment is rendered against the sufficiency of an indictment or against the Government upon any other question arising before actual trial; limiting the right of review in cases of felony punishable only by fine and imprisonment to the circuit court of appeals, and making speedy provision for the construction of such prisons and reformatories as may be necessary for the confinement of United States convicts.

The report of the Postmaster-General contains a detailed statement of the operations of the Post-Office Department during the last fiscal year and much interesting information touching this important branch of the public service.

The business of the mails indicates with absolute certainty the condition of the business of the country, and depression in financial affairs inevitably and quickly reduces the postal revenues. Therefore a larger discrepancy than usual between the Post-Office receipts and expenditures is the expected and unavoidable result of the distressing stringency which has prevailed throughout the country during much of the time covered by the Postmaster-General's report.

At a date when better times were anticipated it was estimated by his predecessor that the deficiency on the 30th day of June, 1893, would be but a little over a million and a half dollars. It amounted, however, to more than five millions. At the same time, and under the influence of like anticipations, estimates were made for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, which exhibited a surplus of revenue over expenditures of $872,245.71; but now, in view of the actual receipts and expenditures during that part of the current fiscal year already expired, the present Postmaster-General estimates that at its close instead of a surplus there will be a deficiency of nearly $8,000,000.

The post-office receipts for the last fiscal year amounted to $75,896,933.16, and its expenditures to $81,074,104.90. This post-office deficiency would disappear or be immensely decreased if less matter was carried free through the mails, an item of which is upward of 300 tons of seeds and grain from the Agricultural Department.

The total number of post-offices in the United States on the 30th day of June, 1893, was 68,403, an increase of 1,284 over the preceding year. Of these 3,360 were Presidential, an increase in that class of 204 over the preceding year.

Forty-two free-delivery offices were added during the year to those already existing, making a total of six hundred and ten cities and towns provided with free delivery on June 30, 1893. Ninety-three other cities and towns are now entitled to this service under the law, but it has not been accorded them on account of insufficient funds to meet the expense of its establishment.

I am decidedly of the opinion that the provisions of the present law permit as general an introduction of this feature of mail service as is necessary or justifiable, and that it ought not to be extended to smaller communities than are now designated.

The expense of free delivery for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, will be more than $11,000,000, and under legislation now existing there must be a constant increase in this item of expenditure.

There were 6,401 additions to the domestic money-order offices during the last fiscal year, being the largest increase in any year since the inauguration of the system. The total number of these offices at the close of the year was 18,434. There were 13,309,735 money orders issued from these offices, being an increase over the preceding year of 1,240,293, and the value of these orders amounted to $127,576,433.65, an increase of $7,509,632.58. There were also issued during the year postal notes amounting to $12,903,076.73.

During the year 195 international money-order offices were added to those already provided, making a total of 2,407 in operation on June 30, 1893. The number of international money orders issued during the year was 1,055,999, an increase over the preceding year of 72,525, and their value was $16,341,837.86, an increase of $1,221,506.31. The number of orders paid was 300,917, an increase over the preceding year of 13,503, and their value was $5,283,375.70, an increase of $94,094.83.

From the foregoing statements it appears that the total issue of money orders and postal notes for the year amounted to $156,821,348.24.

The number of letters and packages mailed during the year for special delivery was 3,375,693, an increase over the preceding year of nearly 22 per cent. The special-delivery stamps used upon these letters and packages amounted to $337,569.30, and the messengers' fees paid for their delivery amounted to $256,592.71, leaving a profit to the Government of $80,976.59.

The Railway Mail Service not only adds to the promptness of mail delivery at all offices, but it is the especial instrumentality which puts the smaller and way places in the service on an equality in that regard with the larger and terminal offices. This branch of the postal service has therefore received much attention from the Postmaster-General, and though it is gratifying to know that it is in a condition of high efficiency and great usefulness, I am led to agree with the Postmaster-General that there is room for its further improvement.

There are now connected with the Post-Office establishment 28,324 employés who are in the classified service. The head of this great Department gives conclusive evidence of the value of civil-service reform when, after an experience that renders his judgment on the subject absolutely reliable, he expresses the opinion that without the benefit of this system it would be impossible to conduct the vast business intrusted to him.

I desire to commend as especially worthy of prompt attention the suggestions of the Postmaster-General relating to a more sensible and business-like organization and a better distribution of responsibility in his Department.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy contains a history of the operations of his Department during the past year, and exhibits a most gratifying condition of the personnel of our Navy. He presents a satisfactory account of the progress which has been made in the construction of vessels, and makes a number of recommendations to which attention is especially invited.

During the past six months the demands for cruising vessels have been many and urgent. There have been revolutions calling for vessels to protect American interests in Nicaragua, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Argentina, and Brazil, while the condition of affairs in Honolulu has required the constant presence of one or more ships. With all these calls upon our Navy, it became necessary, in order to make up a sufficient fleet to patrol the Bering Sea under the modus vivendi agreed upon with Great Britain, to detail to that service one vessel from the Fish Commission and three from the Revenue Marine.

Progress in the construction of new vessels has not been as rapid as was anticipated. There have been delays in the completion of unarmored vessels, but for the most part they have been such as are constantly occurring even in countries having the largest experience in naval shipbuilding. The most serious delays, however, have been in the work upon armored ships. The trouble has been the failure of contractors to deliver armor as agreed. The difficulties seem now, however, to have been all overcome, and armor is being delivered with satisfactory promptness. As a result of the experience acquired by shipbuilders and designers and material men, it is believed that the dates when vessels will be completed can now be estimated with reasonable accuracy. Great guns, rapid-fire guns, torpedoes, and powder are being promptly supplied.

The following vessels of the new Navy have been completed and are now ready for service:

The double-turreted coast-defense monitor Miantonomoh, the double-turreted coast-defense monitor Monterey, the armored cruiser New York, the protected cruisers Baltimore, Chicago, Philadelphia, Newark, San Francisco, Charleston, Atlanta, and Boston, the cruiser Detroit, the gunboats Yorktown, Concord, Bennington, Machias, Castine, and Petrel, the dispatch vessel Dolphin, the practice vessel Bancroft, and the dynamite gunboat Vesuvius. Of these the Bancroft, Machias, Detroit, and Castine have been placed in commission during the current calendar year.

The following vessels are in process of construc tion: The second-class battle ships Maine and Texas, the cruisers Montgomery and Marblehead, and the coast-defense monitors Terror, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Monadnock, all of which will be completed within one year; the harbor-defense ram Katahdin and the protected cruisers Columbia, Minneapolis, Olympia, Cincinnati, and Raleigh, all of which will be completed prior to July 1, 1895; the first-class battle ships Iowa, Indiana, Massachusetts, and Oregon, which will be completed February 1, 1896, and the armored cruiser Brooklyn, which will be completed by August 1 of that year. It is also expected that the three gunboats authorized by the last Congress will be completed in less than two years.

Since 1886 Congress has at each session authorized the building of one or more vessels, and the Secretary of the Navy presents an earnest plea for the continuance of this plan. He recommends the authorization of at least one battle ship and six torpedo boats.

While I am distinctly in favor of consistently pursuing the policy we have inaugurated of building up a thorough and efficient Navy, I can not refrain from the suggestion that the Congress should carefully take into account the number of unfinished vessels on our hands and the depleted condition of our Treasury in considering the propriety of an appropriation at this time to begin new work.

The method of employing mechanical labor at navy-yards through boards of labor and making efficiency the sole test by which laborers are employed and continued is producing the best results and the Secretary is earnestly devoting himself to its development. Attention is invited to the statements of his report in regard to the workings of the system.

The Secretary of the Interior has the supervision of so many important subjects that his report is of especial value and interest.

On the 30th day of June, 1893, there were on the pension rolls 966,012 names, an increase of 89,944 over the number on the rolls June 30, 1892. Of these there were 17 widows and daughters of Revolutionary soldiers, 86 survivors of the war of 1812, 5,425 widows of soldiers of that war, 21,518 survivors and widows of the Mexican war, 3,882 survivors and widows of Indian wars, 234 army nurses, and 475,645 survivors and widows and children of deceased soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion. The latter number represents those pensioned on account of disabilities or death resulting from army and navy service. The number of persons remaining on the rolls June 30, 1893, who were pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, which allows pensions on account of death and disability not chargeable to army service, was 459,155.

The number added to the rolls during the year was 123,634, and the number dropped was 33,690. The first payments on pensions allowed during the year amounted to $33,756,549.98. This includes arrears, or the accumulation between the time from which the allowance of pension dates and the time of actually granting the certificate.

Although the law of 1890 permits pensions for disabilities not related to military service, yet as a requisite to its benefits a disability must exist incapacitating applicants "from the performance of manual labor to such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support." The execution of this law in its early stages does not seem to have been in accord with its true intention; but toward the close of the last Administration an authoritative construction was given to the statute, and since that time this construction has been followed. This has had the effect of limiting the operation of the law to its intended purpose. The discovery having been made that many names had been put upon the pension roll by means of wholesale and gigantic frauds, the Commissioner suspended payments upon a number of pensions which seemed to be fraudulent or unauthorized pending a complete examination, giving notice to the pensioners in order that they might have an opportunity to establish, if possible, the justice of their claims notwithstanding apparent invalidity.

This, I understand, is the practice which has for a long time prevailed in the Pension Bureau; but after entering upon these recent investigations the Commissioner modified this rule so as not to allow, until after a complete examination, interference with the payment of a pension apparently not altogether void, but which merely had been fixed at a rate higher than that authorized by law.

I am unable to understand why frauds in the pension rolls should not be exposed and corrected with thoroughness and vigor. Every name fraudulently put upon these rolls is a wicked imposition upon the kindly sentiment in which pensions have their origin; every fraudulent pensioner has become a bad citizen; every false oath in support of a pension has made perjury more common, and false and undeserving pensioners rob the people not only of their money, but of the patriotic sentiment which the survivors of a war, fought for the preservation of the Union, ought to inspire. Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments by the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds. By no means the least wrong done is to brave and deserving pensioners, who certainly ought not to be condemned to such association.

Those who attempt in the line of duty to rectify these wrongs should not be accused of enmity or indifference to the claims of honest veterans.

The sum expended on account of pensions for the year ending June 30, 1893, was $156,740,467.14.

The Commissioner estimates that $165,000,000 will be required to pay pensions during the year ending June 30, 1894.

The condition of the Indians and their ultimate fate are subjects which are related to a sacred duty of the Government, and which strongly appeal to the sense of justice and the sympathy of our people.

Our Indians number about 248,000. Most of them are located on 161 reservations, containing 86,116,531 acres of land. About 110,000 of these Indians have, to a large degree, adopted civilized customs. Lands in severalty have been allotted to many of them. Such allotments have been made to 10,000 individuals during the last fiscal year, embracing about 1,000,000 acres. The number of Indian Government schools open during the year was 195, an increase of 12 over the preceding year. Of this total 170 were on reservations, of which 73 were boarding schools and 97 were day schools. Twenty boarding schools and 5 day schools supported by the Government were not located on reservations. The total number of Indian children enrolled during the year as attendants of all schools was 21,138, an increase of 1,231 over the enrollment for the previous year.

I am sure that secular education and moral and religious teaching must be important factors in any effort to save the Indian and lead him to civilization. I believe, too, that the relinquishment of tribal relations and the holding of land in severalty may, in favorable conditions, aid this consummation. It seems to me, however, that allotments of land in severalty ought to be made with great care and circumspection. If hastily done, before the Indian knows its meaning, while yet he has little or no idea of tilling a farm and no conception of thrift, there is great danger that a reservation life in tribal relations may be exchanged for the pauperism of civilization, instead of its independence and elevation.

The solution of the Indian problem depends very largely upon good administration. The personal fitness of agents and their adaptability to the peculiar duty of caring for their wards, is of the utmost importance.

The law providing that, except in especial cases, army officers shall be detailed as Indian agents it is hoped will prove a successful experiment.

There is danger of great abuses creeping into the prosecution of claims for Indian depredations, and I recommend that every possible safeguard be provided against the enforcement of unjust and fictitious claims of this description.

The appropriations on account of the Indian Bureau for the year ending June 30, 1894, amount to $7,954,962.99, a decrease as compared with the year preceding it of $387,131.95.

The vast area of land which but a short time ago constituted the public domain is rapidly falling into private hands. It is certain that in the transfer the beneficent intention of the Government to supply from its domain homes to the industrious and worthy home-seekers is often frustrated. Though the speculator, who stands with extortionate purpose between the Land Office and those who, with their families, are invited by the Government to settle on the public lands, is a despicable character who ought not to be tolerated, yet it is difficult to thwart his schemes. The recent opening to settlement of the lands in the Cherokee Outlet, embracing an area of 6,500,000 acres, notwithstanding the utmost care in framing the regulations governing the selection of locations and notwithstanding the presence of United States troops, furnished an exhibition, though perhaps in a modified degree, of the mad scramble, the violence, and the fraudulent occupation which have accompanied previous openings of public land.

I concur with the Secretary in the belief that these outrageous incidents can not be entirely prevented without a change in the laws on the subject, and I hope his recommendations in that direction will be favorably considered.

I especially commend to the attention of the Congress the statements contained in the Secretary's report concerning forestry. The time has come when efficient measures should be taken for the preservation of our forests from indiscriminate and remediless destruction.

The report of the Secretary of Agriculture will be found exceedingly interesting, especially to that large part of our citizens intimately concerned in agricultural occupations.

On the 7th day of March, 1893, there were upon its pay rolls 2,430 employés. This number has been reduced to 1,850 persons. In view of a depleted public Treasury and the imperative demand of the people for economy in the administration of their Government, the Secretary has entered upon the task of rationally reducing expenditures by the elimination from the pay rolls of all persons not needed for an efficient conduct of the affairs of the Department.

During the first quarter of the present year the expenses of the Department aggregated $345,876.76, as against $402,012.42 for the corresponding period of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. The Secretary makes apparent his intention to continue this rate of reduction by submitting estimates for the next fiscal year less by $994,2·0 than those for the present year.

Among the heads of divisions in this Department the changes have been exceedingly few. Three vacancies occurring from death and resignations have been filled by the promotion of assistants in the same divisions.

These promotions of experienced and faithful assistants have not only been in the interest of efficient work, but have suggested to those in the Department who look for retention and promotion that merit and devotion to duty are their best reliance.

The amount appropriated for the Bureau of Animal Industry for the current fiscal year is $850,000; the estimate for the ensuing year is $700,000.

The regulations of 1892 concerning Texas fever have been enforced during the last year, and the large stockyards of the country have been kept free from infection. Occasional local outbreaks have been largely such as could have been effectually guarded against by the owners of the affected cattle.

While contagious pleuro-pneumonia in cattle has been eradicated, animal tuberculosis, a disease widespread and more dangerous to human life than pleuro-pneumonia, is still prevalent. Investigations have been made during the past year as to the means of its communication and the method of its correct diagnosis. Much progress has been made in this direction by the studies of the division of animal pathology, but work ought to be extended, in coöperation with local authorities, until the danger to human life arising from this cause is reduced to a minimum.

The number of animals arriving from Canada during the year and inspected by Bureau officers was 462,092, and the number from transatlantic countries was 1,297. No contagious diseases were found among the imported animals.

The total number of inspections of cattle for export during the past fiscal year was 611,542. The exports show a falling off of about 25 per cent from the preceding year, the decrease occurring entirely in the last half of the year. This suggests that the falling off may have been largely due to an increase in the price of American export cattle.

During the year ending June 30, 1893, exports of inspected pork aggregated 20,677,410 pounds as against 38,152,874 pounds for the preceding year. The falling off in this export was not confined, however, to inspected pork, the total quantity exported for 1892 being 665,490,616 pounds, while in 1893 it was only 527,308,695 pounds.

I join the Secretary in recommending that hereafter each applicant for the position of inspector or assistant inspector in the Bureau of Animal Industry be required, as a condition precedent to his appointment, to exhibit to the United States Civil Service Commission his diploma from an established, regular, and reputable veterinary college, and that this be supplemented by such an examination in veterinary science as the Commission may prescribe.

The exports of agricultural products from the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, attained the enormous figure of $800,000,000, in round numbers, being 78.7 per cent of our total exports. In the last fiscal year this aggregate was greatly reduced, but, nevertheless, reached 615,000,000, being 75.1 per cent of all American commodities exported.

A review of our agricultural exports with special reference to their destination will show that in almost every line the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland absorbs by far the largest proportion. Of cattle the total exports aggregated in value for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, $26,000,000, of which Great Britain took considerably over $25,000,000. Of beef products of all kinds our total exports were $28,000,000, of which Great Britain took $24,000,000. Of pork products the total exports were $84,000,000, of which Great Britain took $53,000,000. In breadstuffs, cotton, and minor products like proportions sent to the same destination are shown.

The work of the statistical division of the Department of Agriculture deals with all that relates to the economics of farming. The main purpose of its monthly reports is to keep the farmers informed as fully as possible of all matters having any influence upon the world's markets, in which their products find sale. Its publications relate especially to the commercial side of farming.

It is therefore of profound importance and vital concern to the farmers of the United States, who represent nearly one-half of our population, and also of direct interest to the whole country, that the work of this division be efficiently performed and that the information it has gathered be promptly diffused.

It is a matter for congratulation to know that the Secretary will not spare any effort to make this part of his work thoroughly useful.

In the year 1839 the Congress appropriated $1,000, to be taken from the Patent Office funds, for the purpose of collecting and distributing rare and improved varieties of seeds, and for prosecuting agricultural investigations and procuring agricultural statistics. From this small beginning the seed division of the Department of Agriculture has grown to its present unwieldy and unjustifiably extravagant proportions.

During the last fiscal year the cost of seeds purchased was $66,548.61. The remainder of an appropriation of $135,000 was expended in putting them up and distributing them. It surely never could have entered the minds of those who first sanctioned appropriations of public money for the purchase of new and improved varieties of seeds for gratuitous distribution that from this would grow large appropriations for the purchase and distribution by members of Congress of ordinary seeds, bulbs, and cuttings which are common in all the States and Territories, and everywhere easily obtainable at low prices.

In each State and Territory an agricultural experiment station has been established. These stations, by their very character and name, are the proper agencies to experiment with and test new varieties of seeds; and yet this indiscriminate and wasteful distribution by legislation and legislators continues, answering no purpose unless it be to remind constituents that their representatives are willing to remember them with gratuities at public cost.

Under the sanction of existing legislation there was sent out from the Agricultural Department during the last fiscal year enough of cabbage seed to plant 19,200 acres of land, a sufficient quantity of beans to plant 4,000 acres, beet seed enough to plant 2,500 acres, sweet corn enough to plant 7,800 acres, sufficient cucumber seed to cover 2,025 acres with vines, and enough muskmelon and watermelon seeds to plant 2,675 acres. The total quantity of flower and vegetable seeds thus distributed was contained in more than nine million packages, and they were sufficient, if planted, to cover 89,596 acres of land.

In view of these facts this enormous expenditure without legitimate returns of benefit ought to be abolished. Anticipating a consummation so manifestly in the interest of good administration, more than $100,000 has been stricken from the estimate made to cover this object for the year ending June 30, 1895; and the Secretary recommends that the remaining $35,000 of the estimate be confined strictly to the purchase of new and improved varieties of seeds, and that these be distributed through experiment stations.

Thus the seed will be tested, and after the test has been completed by the experiment station the propagation of the useful varieties and the rejection of the valueless may safely be left to the common sense of the people.

The continued intelligent execution of the civil-service law and the increasing approval by the people of its operation are most gratifying. The recent extension of its limitations and regulations to the employés at free-delivery post-offices, which has been honestly and promptly accomplished by the Commission, with the hearty coöperation of the Postmaster-General, is an immensely important advance in the usefulness of the system.

I am, if possible, more than ever convinced of the incalculable benefits conferred by the civil-service law, not only in its effect upon the public service, but also, what is even more important, in its effect in elevating the tone of political life generally.

The course of civil-service reform in this country instructively and interestingly illustrates how strong a hold a movement gains upon our people which has underlying it a sentiment of justice and right, and which at the same time promises better administration of their Government.

The law embodying this reform found its way to our statute book more from fear of the popular sentiment existing in its favor than from any love for the reform itself on the part of legislators; and it has lived and grown and flourished in spite of the covert as well as open hostility of spoilsmen and notwithstanding the querulous impracticability of many self-constituted guardians. Beneath all the vagaries and sublimated theories which are attracted to it there underlies this reform a sturdy commonsense principle not only suited to this mundane sphere, but whose application our people are more and more recognizing to be absolutely essential to the most successful operation of their Government, if not to its perpetuity.

It seems to me to be entirely inconsistent with the character of this reform, as well as with its best enforcement, to oblige the Commission to rely for clerical assistance upon clerks detailed from other Departments. There ought not to be such a condition in any Department that clerks hired to do work there can be spared to habitually work at another place, and it does not accord with a sensible view of civil-service reform that persons should be employed on the theory that their labor is necessary in one Department when in point of fact their services are devoted to entirely different work in another Department.

I earnestly urge that the clerks necessary to carry on the work of the Commission be regularly put upon its roster, and that the system of obliging the Commissioners to rely upon the services of clerks belonging to other Departments be discontinued. This ought not to increase the expense to the Government, while it would certainly be more consistent and add greatly to the efficiency of the Commission.

Economy in public expenditure is a duty that can not innocently be neglected by those intrusted with the control of money drawn from the people for public uses. It must be confessed that our apparently endless resources, the familiarity of our people with immense accumulations of wealth, the growing sentiment among them that the expenditure of public money should in some manner be to their immediate and personal advantage, the indirect and almost stealthy manner in which a large part of our taxes are exacted, and a degenerated sense of official accountability have led to growing extravagance in governmental appropriations.

At this time, when a depleted public Treasury confronts us, when many of our people are engaged in a hard struggle for the necessaries of life, and when enforced economy is pressing upon the great mass of our countrymen, I desire to urge with all the earnestness at my command that Congressional legislation be so limited by strict economy as to exhibit an appreciation of the condition of the Treasury and a sympathy with the straitened circumstances of our fellow-citizens.

The duty of public economy is also of immense importance in its intimate and necessary relation to the task now in hand of providing revenue to meet Government expenditures, and yet reducing the people's burden of Federal taxation.

After a hard struggle tariff reform is directly before us. Nothing so important claims our attention and nothing so clearly presents itself as both an opportunity and a duty—an opportunity to deserve the gratitude of our fellow-citizens and a duty imposed upon us by our oft-repeated professions and by the emphatic mandate of the people. After a full discussion our countrymen have spoken in favor of this reform, and they have confided the work of its accomplishment to the hands of those who are solemnly pledged to it.

If there is anything in the theory of a representation in public places of the people and their desires, if public officers are really the servants of the people, and if political promises and professions have any binding force, our failure to give the relief so long awaited will be sheer recreancy. Nothing should intervene to distract our attention or disturb our effort until this reform is accomplished by wise and careful legislation.

While we should stanchly adhere to the principle that only the necessity of revenue justifies the imposition of tariff duties and other Federal taxation, and that they should be limited by strict economy, we can not close our eyes to the fact that conditions have grown up among us which in justice and fairness call for discriminating care in the distribution of such duties and taxation as the emergencies of our Government actually demand.

Manifestly, if we are to aid the people directly through tariff reform, one of its most obvious features should be a reduction in present tariff charges upon the necessaries of life. The benefits of such a reduction would be palpable and substantial, seen and felt by thousands who would be better fed and better clothed and better sheltered. These gifts should be the willing benefactions of a Government whose highest function is the promotion of the welfare of the people.

Not less closely related to our people's prosperity and well-being is the removal of restrictions upon the importation of the raw materials necessary to our manufactures. The world should be open to our national ingenuity and enterprise. This can not be while Federal legislation, through the imposition of high tariff, forbids to American manufacturers as cheap materials as those used by their competitors. It is quite obvious that the enhancement of the price of our manufactured products resulting from this policy not only confines the market for these products within our own borders, to the direct disadvantage of our manufacturers, but also increases their cost to our citizens.

The interests of labor are certainly, though indirectly, involved in this feature of our tariff system. The sharp competition and active struggle among our manufacturers to supply the limited demand for their goods soon fill the narrow market to which they are confined. Then follow a suspension of work in mills and factories, a discharge of employés, and distress in the homes of our workingmen.

Even if the often disproved assertion could be made good that a lower rate of wages would result from free raw materials and low tariff duties, the intelligence of our workingmen leads them quickly to discover that their steady employment, permitted by free raw materials, is the most important factor in their relation to tariff legislation.

A measure has been prepared by the appropriate Congressional committee embodying tariff reform on the lines herein suggested, which will be promptly submitted for legislative action. It is the result of much patriotic and unselfish work, and I believe it deals with its subject consistently and as thoroughly as existing conditions permit.

I am satisfied that the reduced tariff duties provided for in the proposed legislation, added to existing internal-revenue taxation, will, in the near future, though perhaps not immediately, produce sufficient revenue to meet the needs of the Government.

The committee, after full consideration, and to provide against a temporary deficiency which may exist before the business of the country adjusts itself to the new tariff schedules, have wisely embraced in their plan a few additional internal-revenue taxes, including a small tax upon incomes derived from certain corporate investments.

These new assessments are not only absolutely just and easily borne, but they have the further merit of being such as can be remitted without unfavorable business disturbance whenever the necessity of their imposition no longer exists.

In my great desire for the success of this measure I can not restrain the suggestion that its success can only be attained by means of unselfish counsel on the part of the friends of tariff reform and as a result of their willingness to subordinate personal desires and ambitions to the general good. The local interests affected by the proposed reform are so numerous and so varied that if all are insisted upon the legislation embodying the reform must inevitably fail.

In conclusion, my intense feeling of responsibility impels me to invoke for the manifold interests of a generous and confiding people the most scrupulous care and to pledge my willing support to every legislative effort for the advancement of the greatness and prosperity of our beloved country.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 4, 1893.

Mr. DOLPH. There have been distributed, while the message was being read, printed copies of what purports to be the message, and on page 9 I find a part of the page devoted to Hawaii. I did not hear it read from the desk. I myself would like to know, and I think the country would like to know, whether it was inadvertently or purposely omitted by the Secretary, or whether the copies which have been circulated are not true copies of the message.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that page 9 was inadvertently omitted by the Secretary. The Secretary will now read the page to which the Senator from Oregon refers.

The Secretary read page 9 of the message.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the message lie on the table, and that the usual number of copies be printed.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire, on the motion to print, to make some remarks upon that portion of the President's message relating to Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. Then let it lie on the table.

Mr. DOLPH. If the motion may go over until to-morrow, I will submit my remarks immediately after the morning business, or I can submit them this afternoon, if in order, although I do not wish to detain the Senate to-day. If the position of the message will be such to-morrow that my remarks will be in order I shall not ask for a postponement of action on the motion to print.

Mr. GORMAN. My motion is that the message lie on the table, and that only the usual number of copies be printed. That will enable the Senator to call up the message in the morning.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well. Then I give notice that to-morrow, after the morning business, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate while I submit some remarks upon that portion of the President's message relating to Hawaii.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HOAR. Is it understood that the message is to come up to-morrow morning for consideration?

Mr. GORMAN. That is my understanding. I ask merely that it lie on the table and that the usual number of copies be printed.

Mr. HOAR. But while the Senator from Oregon is at liberty to call it up, if an objection is interposed, it will require a majority vote of the Senate to take the message from the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will vote to take it up.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no earthly objection to the Senator from Oregon addressing the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then we had better not make the order to print until to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the message be printed, so that every Senator will have it on his desk, and may understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is this trouble: If the motion to print is adopted then there will be no question before the Senate for debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion to print will have been adopted and the message will be upon the table; and I shall move to proceed to its consideration in order that the Senator from Oregon may speak upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that understanding I have no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nobody wants to suppress free speech here.

Mr. GORMAN. More than that, my motion is to print only the usual number. To-morrow I shall make a motion to print an extra number, as is customary, and on that motion the Senator from Oregon can address the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Any way will be satisfactory so that a debatable question will be before the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no objection to that course. We all desire it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the message lie on the table and that the usual number be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 to pay the salaries and actual and necessary expenses of as many additional deputy collectors of internal revenue as it may be found necessary for the collectors in the several districts to appoint in order to the more thorough and effective execution of the act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, relating to the registration of, and the issuance of certificates of residence to, Chinese laborers who are entitled to remain in the United States under the provisions of these laws, which additional deputy collectors shall be paid, out of the sum hereby appropriated, by such allowances as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of internal revenue: Provided, That collectors of internal revenue shall not receive any fee or other compensation for the registration and issuance of certificates of residence to Chinese laborers who are entitled to remain in the United States under the provisions of the said laws.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. Before it goes to the committee I should like to call attention to a very extraordinary omission in the joint resolution. As I heard it read it provides for the payment of such additional collectors of internal revenue as it may be found necessary for the various collectors to appoint. It nowhere gives authority to any particular officer, to the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States, to appoint them, and it ought to contain such a provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. It says "deputy collectors."

Mr. HOAR. I understand; "additional deputy collectors."

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a general law authorizing the appointment of deputy collectors.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that; but the joint resolution does not put it under the general law. It merely provides for the payment of such deputy collectors as it may be found necessary to appoint. Now suppose the collector at San Francisco—I put an extreme case—thinks it necessary to appoint a thousand deputy collectors, is he entitled to do so? There ought to be some limitation

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator means a limitation upon the power of appointment?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh!

Mr. HOAR. It ought to be lodged in either the Secretary of the Treasury or the President.

Mr. CULLOM. That can be fixed in the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the absence of objection.

Mr. CULLOM. I think some other committee has had charge of a portion of the subject-matter involved in the bill. I presume it should properly be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PEFFER. I prefer that it should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be so referred.

Mr. PEFFER. I introduce (by request) a bill to regulate the importation and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States, to which I wish to call attention, as it is one of a somewhat peculiar character. It has been sent to me by a very intelligent citizen of the State of Kansas, a very earnest temperance worker. While the bill is not drawn in such form as a lawyer would prepare it, and while there may be some objections to its phraseology, yet my correspondent asks that it be submitted to the Senate without any change whatever. So I introduce the bill and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (S. 1182) to regulate the importation and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to limit the office of President to one term for each incumbent; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 40) to amend the Constitution so as to elect the President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people; which was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the absence of objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HOAR. I think the bill should be referred to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so referred in the absence of objection.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 41) relative to the erection of a penitentiary in the State of North Dakota, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

COL. ANSON MILLS.

Mr. MILLS. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent that it may be now considered.

The joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Anson Mills, colonel Third Regiment United States Cavalry, having been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate as a commissioner of the United States under the convention between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, concluded and signed by the contracting parties at the city of Washington, March 1, 1889, is hereby permitted to accept and exercise the functions of said office of commissioner: Provided, Said officer shall continue to receive his emoluments in pay and allowances as colonel in the Army while holding said office of commissioner the same as he would receive were he performing such duty under military orders, and no other additional pay or emoluments for his services as such commissioner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to inquire what is the necessity for the passage of the joint resolution?

Mr. MILLS. I will state. Col. Anson Mills is now colonel of the Third Regiment of Cavalry of the United States. He is a very skilled officer, familiar with the boundaries of the Rio Grande, where he served for a number of years. Under an agreement between the Republic of Mexico and that of the United States a joint commission has been raised to survey and fix the boundary between the two countries. Col. Mills has been selected by the President on account of his skill and his acquaintance with that country to represent the Government of the United States as the engineer on that commission; but there is a provision of law which prevents him from accepting a position of that sort without vacating his place in the Army. The joint resolution simply provides for giving the consent of Congress that he, an officer of the Army of the United States, drawing his pay as an officer of the Army, and with no other emoluments, may perform this duty for the Government of the United States. That is all.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether the resolution gives the officer the same compensation he now receives?

Mr. MILLS. The joint resolution does not change his pay, but leaves him an officer of the United States Army, detailed to do this business, which the law now in existence forbids him to do without the consent of Congress.

Mr. PALMER. Without additional pay?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Texas kindly state a little more distinctly the precise function this officer is to perform as a commissioner, notwithstanding he is an officer of the Army? I should like to hear, as I did not quite catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. MILLS. The officer is to act as engineer, as I understand, and under the treaty one is to be appointed by each government. He has been selected by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of the boundary commission?

Mr. MILLS. Of the boundary commission.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the commission authorized to settle the boundary or only to report to the Executive?

Mr. MILLS. It is authorized to survey and fix the boundary line between the United States and Mexico on the Rio Grande River.

Mr. CHANDLER. How many commissioners are there?

Mr. MILLS. I have the convention and will read the provision relating to this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is this officer the sole United States commissioner?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; there are others. The convention provides that—

The International Boundary Commission shall be composed of a commissioner appointed by the President of the United States of America and another appointed by the President of the United States of Mexico, in accordance with the constitutional provisions of each country, of a consulting engineer, appointed in the same manner by each government, and of such secretaries and interpreters as either government may see fit to add to its commission. Each Government separately shall fix the salaries and emoluments of the members of its commission.

Mr. CHANDLER. If I understand, there are three commissioners on the part of the United States, and this military officer is only one of the three?

Mr. MILLS. He is one of those appointed by this Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. He is the engineer member of the commission.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; so I understand.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Texas read from the document in his hand something which I understand is inconsistent with his verbal answer. Of course he did not wish to be misunderstood, but he probably was. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] inquired whether there were three commissioners on the part of the United States, and I understood the Senator from Texas to say there was one commissioner on the part of each Government.

Mr. MILLS. I have read the exact language of the convention to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire asked if there were three commissioners.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from New Hampshire said "three," but I did not make any answer in reply, if I recollect. I read the clause in the document.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LABORER IN LAW LIBRARY.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 4, 1893.

This being the day fixed by the Constitution for the annual meeting of Congress, the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress assembled in their Hall for their second session at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER (Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia) called the House to order.

The Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, our benefactor, our father, and our friend, we adore Thee for Thy loving-kindnesses and Thy tender mercies. We thank Thee, our Father, for Thy protection and Thy watch-care. We thank Thee that Thou hast preserved Thy servants in their separation and hast brought them again, in Congress assembled, to deliberate upon the affairs of this nation. We do not forget, our Father, that in this intermission our ranks have been broken and two members of this House have been called away. Especially are we reminded that one face accustomed to be seen here is absent, that one seat so long and ably filled is vacant.

Grant, our Father, that those who knew and loved him may cherish his memory and imitate his virtues, and may his gentleness, and his sympathy, and his life-long devotion to duty be an inspiration to us all. Now, our Father, we ask Thee to let Thy richest benediction rest upon this session of the House of Representatives. May the laws that shall be enacted here be wise and for the good of our people. Be with the President of the United States and his Cabinet; preserve the health of their bodies and the vigor of their minds. May Thy blessing so rest upon this Administration that the people of this vast nation, united and happy, may be able to adore Thee for Thy goodness and to declare that the Lord of Hosts is with us and the God of Jacob is our refuge. We ask this through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. Two hundred and fifty-five members have answered to their names.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Since I have been a member of this House it has been the invariable custom at the opening of a second session of Congress to call the roll by States, and by referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I find that back to the early days of our Government the same practice has prevailed.

I move, therefore, that in order to conform to a precedent which has been so long established as to make it parliamentary law, the roll call just taken be recorded by States.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the roll will be entered in that way, but the Chair does not see any necessity for it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think it is necessary, and I find there is no rule requiring the roll of the members to be called by States at the second session, but it has been the invariable custom.

I find that in the very early Congresses the record says: "The following members appeared," etc.; but for more than fifty years the roll has been called by States at each second session of Congress and the names have been so recorded.

At the opening of the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, December 2, 1850, Hon. Howell Cobb, Speaker, the record says:

> The roll of members was called over by States by the Clerk of the House.

At the opening of the third session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, December 1, 1856, the record says:

> The roll of members was called over by States.

At the opening of the second session of the Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, and Fortieth Congresses the roll was called and recorded by States.

At the opening of the second session of the Forty-first Congress, which succeeded an extra session like the present, the Speaker, Mr. Blaine, said:

> The Clerk will call the roll by States.

I also find that the roll was called and recorded by States at the second session of the Forty-second, Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses.

It will be remembered that the second session of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses succeeded extra sessions, making the situation like the present in those cases. At the opening of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress the Speaker said:

> In accordance with the usual course, the Clerk is directed to call the roll of members by States.

And so on from that time to the present, including the second session of the last Congress, the roll has been, under the direction of the Speaker, called by States and so recorded.

I do not regard the matter as material, but the custom is so ancient and has been so unbroken that it may be said to be unwritten parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. No rule of the House requires the roll to be called or recorded in the manner which the gentleman suggests; on the contrary the rules require that the roll be called alphabetically, except that upon the organization of the House and when in the absence of the Speaker the Clerk discharges the duty of calling the House to order, the rules require him to have the roll called by States. In other cases the provision of the rule is that the roll be called alphabetically.

Mr. REED. Let us proceed according to the rules.

The SPEAKER. The roll will be so entered.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have shown that under rules similar to those of the present Congress, the custom has been invariable to both call and record the roll of members by States. This, however, is not now a question of calling the roll, but of recording it.

The SPEAKER. But of course it must be recorded as called. The Clerk will so record it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

During the roll call, a message from the Senate by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that a quorum of the Senate had assembled and that the Senate was ready to proceed to business.

The message further announced that Mr. MCPHERSON and Mr. SHERMAN had been appointed a committee on the part of the Senate to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Hon. Hezekiah S. Bundy, elected as a Representative from the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. William H. Enochs, is present, and I ask that the oath of office be administered to him.

The SPEAKER. The credentials of the member-elect will be read.

Mr. Bundy was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that Maj. Griffin, elected to fill the vacancy from the first district of the State of Michigan, is present and desires to be sworn in. His credentials have not yet arrived, but I apprehend that no question will be made on that point.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Michigan, whose credentials have not yet arrived, will be sworn in.

There was no objection.

Mr. Griffin then appeared at the bar of the House and was duly qualified, taking the oath prescribed by law.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CAMINETTI, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. FITHIAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

Gilbert, deceased; William Henderson, deceased; C. C. Baker; William Wallace, deceased; E. S. Grove, deceased; J. N. Hays; Morgan Coxen, deceased, J. B. Womack, deceased; Francis Kotz, deceased; A. H. Kennedy, deceased; Morgan M. Lee; and John Miller, deceased.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese-exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 to pay the salaries and actual and necessary expenses of as many additional deputy collectors of internal revenue as it may be found necessary for the collectors in the several districts to appoint, in order to the more thorough and effective execution of the act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, relating to the registration of and the issuance of certificates of residence to Chinese laborers who are entitled to remain in the United States under the provisions of these laws, which additional deputy collectors shall be paid out of the sum hereby appropriated, by such allowances as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided, That collectors of internal revenue shall not receive any fee or other compensation for the registration and issuance of certificates of residence to Chinese laborers who are entitled to remain in the United States under the provisions of the said laws.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that resolution I desire to have read a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., December 1, 1893.

SIR: Referring to the conversation which I have had with you in relation to the Chinese exclusion act, I would say that under the construction which the First Comptroller has felt bound to give to section 9 of the act of May 5, 1892, provision can not be found, in the appropriation heretofore made by the sundry civil bill, for payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out that act. As in my opinion a thorough and effective execution of those provisions of the law which devolve upon collectors of internal revenue, the duty of registering and issuing certificates of residence to such Chinese laborers as may be found entitled to remain in the United States requires the appointment of a number of additional deputy collectors who may be assigned to this particular work, and whose salaries and necessary expenses shall be provided for by an appropriation directly applicable to that purpose, I have prepared, and have the honor to transmit to you herewith, a draft of a joint resolution of Congress making such an appropriation. The sum of $50,000 which it provides for is, I believe upon careful consideration of the matter, the lowest amount that should be appropriated for this purpose, and I would therefore respectfully ask of you the presentation of this resolution to your committee with a view to its introduction and passage at an early date.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. S. MILLER, Commissioner.

Hon. J. D. SAYERS,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] for the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] a question.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understand that this appropriation of $50,000 is to carry into effect the act of 1892, and the amendment thereto.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is it believed that $50,000 is a sufficient sum?

Mr. SAYERS. It is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that it will be sufficient.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Very well, then.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] for immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there other objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HINES] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The resolution, providing for an investigation of the extent, causes, and effect upon interstate commerce of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company strike, was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HINES] for the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENGROSSMENT OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That after the passage of this resolution by the House, all bills and joint resolutions shall be engrossed only after they have passed the House.

Resolved, That the rule of the House numbered XXI be amended in line 5 of said rule by striking out in said line the words, "engrossed and," so that said rule will read, "shall the bill be read a third time," etc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like the gentleman from Tennessee to explain the necessity for the passage of that resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Rule XXI, which we propose to amend, provides for the engrossment of bills and joint resolutions before they are read the third time. As a fact this engrossment never takes place. I say never. I believe within my entire experience in the House I have never known such engrossment to actually take place, with only two or three exceptions.

The concurrent resolution, which has been adopted by the two Houses, provides for the printing of these engrossed measures, bills, and joint resolutions, does away with the manuscript copy which we have heretofore used, and provides for a printed copy. It is not more impracticable, possibly, to print than to write and to have an engrossed copy; but as a fact the printed copy will now take the place of the original manuscript engrossed copy; and this resolution simply changes the rules of the House so as to provide that the engrossment shall take place after the passage of the bill. It takes place that way now as a fact. A measure is not engrossed until after it is passed. This simply makes the rules conform to that which is now done. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I trust this will not be acted upon at once.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Permit me a moment——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this matter will go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let me make a statement. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, was regularly introduced at the extraordinary session, and was considered by the Committee on Rules. They unanimously agreed that it should pass; but inasmuch as we were crowded the last day of the session, it was not possible to get the attention of the House; and for that reason it was not considered; but the Committee on Rules, both sides, unanimously agreed that this resolution ought to pass. I should have stated that much.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to take a little time to consider this matter now for the first time brought to the attention of the House. I think it ought to go over for the present.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

RECESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move that the House take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes) the House was declared in recess for fifteen minutes.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON PRESIDENT.

At 1 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m. the committee appointed to wait upon the President appeared at the bar of the House.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed to wait upon the President and to inform him that the two Houses are in session and ready to receive any communication from him, respectfully report that they have discharged their duty and are requested by the President to say that he will communicate with the two Houses at once in writing.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

At 1 o'clock and 35 minutes a message in writing from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. Pruden, one of his secretaries.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the message of the President of the United States.

The message was read by the Clerk of the House. (For text of message see Senate proceedings.)

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this message will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the usual number of copies will be ordered printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution (H. Res. 77) conferring diplomas upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES O'NEILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the sad and painful duty devolves upon me, at the request of the delegation from the State of Pennsylvania, to announce to the House of Representatives, in the accepted formal way, the death of our loved and honored colleague, Hon. Charles O'Neill, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, who died at his home in the city of Philadelphia on the 25th day of November last.

His death was not unexpected. Those of us who saw and heard him administer the oath of office—almost his last official act—to the distinguished Speaker of this Congress, felt that the shadows of death were already encompassing him thick and fast, and that "the father of the House" would soon be called to join his loved associates, Kelley and Randall, with whom he had earnestly labored, with equal fidelity, for more than a quarter of a century.

But one Representative remains in this House who was associated with him in the consummation of the patriotic, loyal, magnificent, and masterful legislation during the terrible and anxious years of the war of the rebellion. Happy, indeed, was my colleague that it was given to him to see his country reunited and to know that his labors had contributed to the peace, prosperity, and happiness of his fellow-countrymen. As we saw him here in this Hall, day by day, for many many years, faithful, earnest, watchful, and true, so he was always and everywhere.

Surrounded by a loving, but broken-hearted family, attended by devoted friends and accompanied by many of his associates of this House, we saw him but a few days since carried to his last earthly resting place. The benediction has followed the prayer, and the requiem has been sung; "ashes to ashes, dust to dust;" Christ accept him, God receive him. He died as he had lived—loved and loving, at peace with all men.

At some future time I shall ask the House to devote a day when the members may express their feelings in memory of our deceased associate. For the present I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania; and

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and to send a duly attested copy to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were adopted.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM LILLY.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, Pennsylvania and this House are confronted to-day with a twofold grief and loss. Hon. William Lilly, a Representative-at-large from the State of Pennsylvania, died at his home at Mauch Chunk on the 1st day of the present month. Elected to this Congress—his first term as a representative of five millions of people—his career of usefulness in this House had just opened. Honored with public trust and distinguished station, which measured years of marked probity and uprightness; familiar with legislative procedure, and understanding the wants of his great people, Pennsylvania looked confidently to his labors and their beneficent results, knowing he would be influenced only by the highest standards and for the good of all. His health was not robust or reliable when he entered upon his duties at the extraordinary session just closed. Gradually he grew weaker and weaker, until the final summons called him to his future home.

Sitting together in the house of representatives of the State of Pennsylvania during the years 1850 and 1851, we find Charles O'Neill and William Lilly earnestly laboring in their young manhood for the best interests of their State. Born in the same year, 1821, we mourn their loss to-day. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. William Lilly, late a representative of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and send a duly attested copy to the family of the deceased.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Springfield, December 2, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor as well as the pleasure of advising you that in pursuance of an invitation extended to the States by authority of Congress, the Legislature of the State of Illinois at its last session caused Mr. Leonard Volk, a distinguished American sculptor, to make a heroic statue in bronze of Gen. James Shields, one of Illinois's most distinguished warriors and statesmen. The same has been placed in position in Statuary Hall at Washington, and will be unveiled on December 6 of this year at the hour of 2 p. m. I respectfully invite your friendly coöperation. I have advised the President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

JOHN P. ALTGELD, Governor.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON,
Vice-President and President of the Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. CULLOM. I give notice that at some convenient hour to-morrow I shall introduce a resolution in reference to the statue, which is now in Statuary Hall, referred to in the communication just read, and ask for its consideration by the Senate. I move that the communication from the governor of Illinois lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Rock River Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Dixon, Ill., praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a great number of petitions from citizens of Ohio, soldiers in the late war, without regard to party, who were honorably discharged, praying that the Senate "thoroughly investigate the present administration of the Pension Bureau, orders of suspension and subsequent orders, which claim to modify, but do not, and which leave us in doubt as to the exact relation we sustain to our Government as survivors of the late war." I ask that the petitions be separately noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

A petition of soldiers of Montville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Chandlersville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Lawrence County, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Martinsville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Bloomingburg, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Castalia, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Wayne County, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Fultonham, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Manchester, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of South Bloomingville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Loudonville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Monroe County, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of East Liverpool, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Waterville, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Pyrmont, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Osborn, Ohio;

A petition of soldiers of Rebellion, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Reform, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Findlay, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Sandfork, Ohio;
A petition of soldiers of Waynesburg, Ohio; and
A petition of soldiers of Windham, Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Cincinnati (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce and Merchants' Exchange, praying for the passage of the national antitrain-wrecking and antitrain-robbing bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The 1st of November last my colleague [Mr. DOLPH] reported from the Committee on Public Lands a bill (S. 945) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," which is now on the Calendar. I present a petition very numerously signed by citizens of Oregon, farmers, who are especially interested in the passage of the bill, in which they strongly urge its passage at an early date. The necessity for early action arises from the fact that under existing law the time within which the parties have the right to make payments on their lands expires on the 1st of January next. I wish to call the especial attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and also of my colleague, to this matter. I hope the bill will be called up at an early date. I move that the petition lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I also present a preamble and resolutions recently passed by the State Horticultural Society of Oregon. As the resolutions refer to a subject of very great importance to the people of the Pacific coast generally, and especially to the people of California, Oregon, and Idaho, I beg the Senate to permit me to cite the petition a little more at length than usual. It is in regard to the prune industry on the Pacific coast.

The resolutions aver that this industry has already become one of very great importance on the Pacific coast and can attain immense proportions as soon as the trees now planted shall fully bear fruit, the product being equal to 150,000,000 pounds per annum in California and about half as much more in Oregon and Washington. They recite that "the national result of such production will be to cause prices to rule low from home competition, so that the grower can not expect more than fair wages for labor and rent for the capital invested, and that the prune-grower suffers from distrust that the duty now collected by the Government will be removed and thus subject him to ruinous foreign competition." The petitioners present these facts to the consideration of the Congress of the United States and memorialize Congress and the President of the United States that the present duty on prune importations shall be sustained for the following reasons, briefly stated:

First. That such protection will encourage an industry of great importance to both producer and consumer.

Second. That our cured prunes, under such protection, are acquiring an excellence of a high order that will increase if the industry is fostered.

Third. That our dried product is far more cleanly and healthful than the common foreign prune.

Fourth. That the law of supply and demand must regulate prices on the fair basis of the needs of both producer and consumer in the home market of the future.

The petitioners further state that they fully believe the result of encouragement of the prune industry will be much greater skill in producing and curing prunes and in developing new varieties, and that the Pacific coast will soon be able to export very largely of a superior quality of such product for the best trade of England as well as to the Americas and Asia.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oregon, praying that an appropriation be made for the publication of a pilot chart of the North Pacific Ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the St. Louis (Mo.) Spanish Club, and a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., praying for a modification of the tariff duties on Mexican imports, and for enlarging commercial intercourse with Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH. I present duplicate resolutions of the Oregon State Horticultural Society, favoring the maintenance of the present duty on prunes, being a copy of the petition just presented by my colleague.

I ask that the resolutions lie on the table and in the course of the next ten days, when I can do so without interfering with more important business, I shall call them up and on a motion for their reference, if there is not something better before the Senate to which I can address myself, I shall make some remarks upon the subject and the question of the tariff generally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a memorial of sundry citizens of Bessemer, Mich., remonstrating against the placing of iron ore on the free list. As the memorial contains data relative to the cost of producing iron ore, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the Detroit (Mich.) Typographical Union, praying for the establishment of a Government telegraph and for the construction of the proposed new Government Printing Office by day labor; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of the New York Jewelers' Board of Trade, praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the principals and superintendents of the American schools for the deaf and dumb held at Chicago, July 24, 1893, praying for the establishment of a department for the technical education of the deaf and dumb at the National Deaf-Mute College; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of John Paul Egbert and other citizens of the United States, praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ADDITIONAL DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese-exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration. I will state to the Senate that it will only take a few moments to pass it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). The Senator from Missouri asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendments reported by the committee be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the word "dollars," the Committee on Appropriations report to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to read:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the salaries and actual and necessary expenses of as many additional deputy collectors of internal revenue, etc.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if the joint resolution does not give a great deal of power, discretion, and latitude to the collectors of internal revenue? I see that it gives power to the collectors to appoint as many deputies as they please. Is it the intention to restrict that in any way? I do not see any restriction in the joint resolution. It seems to me as though the power to appoint deputy collectors should be with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator from New Jersey know how deputy collectors are appointed?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose deputy collectors are appointed by the Treasury Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then necessarily the number of deputy collectors would depend upon the action of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But the collectors themselves have the right to recommend or appoint as many deputies as they please, as I understand it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator that the committee have reported an amendment, which has not yet been read, that the collectors shall appoint as many deputies as the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem necessary. That really does not change the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives, because under the general law collectors of internal revenue can only appoint the number of deputies the Secretary will approve, and the deputies can not be increased in any way except with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If such appointments are already sufficiently guarded by law, I have no objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. The ordinary appointments of deputy collectors of internal revenue are guarded by the general law. This is a special provision which is to operate for six months, and the law under which the appointments are to be made must be complied with in five months from now, from the 3d of November to the 3d of May. This is a specific appropriation for a specific object, and an amendment reported by the committee gives the control of the number of deputies to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well.

Mr. CALL. I understand that this joint resolution gives the appointment of the deputies absolutely to the collectors. It seems to me the objection suggested is well founded, and that the Secretary ought to be responsible for the persons appointed as well as for their number.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the classes of officers who are mere deputies, like deputy marshals and deputy collectors of internal revenue—I believe it does not apply to deputy collectors of customs—are appointed by the official who is personally responsible for their acts. They are not considered as coming within the constitutional provision as to the appointment of public officers. In the appropriation bills from year to year there is a limitation of the appointment of such deputies, as I understand, to the number existing at a particular time, that there shall not be any increase in that number.

This joint resolution as it came to us from the House of Representatives simply said that the sum of $50,000, without saying "or so much thereof as shall be necessary," is appropriated for the payment of salaries and expenses of as many deputy collectors as may be found necessary. It did not vest distinctly in anybody the discretion, but simply said $50,000 should be appropriated to pay so many deputy collectors as should be found necessary, leaving it in that vague and indeterminate condition.

The only limit, therefore, the only thing which will prevent the appointment of a thousand such collectors is the provision in the latter part of the joint resolution that the allowances shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. So, of course, no collector will be likely to appoint a number which the Secretary will not approve, because if he does they would not get any pay. The amendment now reported, as I understand, makes the thing clear; that is, it puts distinctly within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion and confers upon him the duty of judging of the necessity.

As I raised the point yesterday, I wish to say that I am satisfied with the joint resolution as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations; which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 7, after the words "revenue as," to strike out "it may be found" and insert "the Secretary of the Treasury may determine to be;" so as to read:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the salaries and actual and necessary expenses of as many additional deputy collectors of internal revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine to be necessary for the collectors in the several districts to appoint in order to the more thorough and effective execution of the act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, relating to the registration of, and the issuance of certificates of residence to, Chinese laborers who are entitled to remain in the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, so far as in his opinion it shall not be inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of all instructions which may have been given to any representative of the United States, or any naval officer thereof, since the 4th day of March, 1881, in regard to the preservation of public order in Hawaii, or the protection of the lives and property of American citizens, or the recognition or support of any government there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am personally in favor of the resolution, but I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In the absence of the chairman of that committee I do not like to see anything done with it except to refer it there. I have no doubt it would be reported back promptly.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely a request for copies of such instructions as the President may think not inconsistent with the public interest, so that we may have the information in convenient form. I suppose probably nearly all the information will be found in the reports already submitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt it will come in the reports, but in view of the President's message, in which he says, I think rather curtly, that he expects to send in further information on the subject, and in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I think it is but courtesy to a member of this body to await his return before final action. I am told he is to be here soon. Perhaps Senators on the other side can state when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will be here.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not know myself; but let the resolution go over.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to that course.

Mr. HOAR. I shall call it up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

RAILROAD LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the approval of public lands by the Secretary of the Interior to the State of Florida for the benefit of the Florida Central and Peninsula Railroad Company alleged to be under the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 17th of May, A. D. 1856, and entitled "An act granting land to the States of Alabama and Florida, etc.," is not in violation of the said act of Congress, without authority of law, and void and of no effect; also whether such lands are not subject to homestead entry under the laws of the United States.

2. To report by bill or otherwise such legislation as may be necessary to protect the rights of homestead settlers on such land and for the issue of patents to innocent purchasers of land in limited quantities who have bought and paid for such land in good faith.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 51) to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida; and

A bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within the Shawnee country, in the State of Kansas.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that 10,000 extra copies of the President's message be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I was surprised yesterday by the statements of the President in his message read to the Senate concerning our relations with Hawaii. Notwithstanding the report of the Secretary of State to the President upon that subject, and the statements contained in the press of the country as to the purposes of the Administration, I could not conceive that it was possible that the Administration had determined upon the forcible overthrow of the existing government in Hawaii and the establishment of the native monarchy. I believed that if such had ever been the purpose of the Administration the expression through the press of the country of the almost unanimous public opinion against such a course would have changed such purpose and have caused the President to modify his supposed instructions to our present minister to Hawaii. But the President in his message yesterday said:

> Just prior to the installation of the present Administration the existing Government of Hawaii had been suddenly overthrown, and a treaty of annexation had been negotiated between the Provisional Government of the islands and the United States, and submitted to the Senate for ratification. This treaty I withdrew for examination, and dispatched Hon. James H. Blount, of Georgia, to Honolulu as a special commissioner to make an impartial investigation of the circumstances attending the change of government, and of all the conditions bearing upon the subject of the treaty.
> After a thorough and exhaustive examination Mr. Blount submitted to me his report, showing beyond all question that the constitutional Government of Hawaii had been subverted with the active aid of our representative to that Government, and through the intimidation caused by the presence of an armed naval force of the United States which was landed for that purpose at the instance of our minister. Upon the facts developed it seemed to me the only honorable course for our Government to pursue was to undo the wrong that had been done by those representing us and to restore as far as practicable the status existing at the time of our forcible intervention. With a view of accomplishing this result within the constitutional limits of executive power, and recognizing all our obligations and responsibilities growing out of any changed conditions brought about by our unjustifiable interference, our present minister at Honolulu has received appropriate instructions to that end. Thus far no information of the accomplishment of any definite results has been received from him.

So far as this statement asserts that the report of Mr. Blount shows beyond all question that the constitutional Government of Hawaii was subverted by the active interference of our minister, and by the presence of an armed naval force of the United States landed for that purpose, it assumes that the report of the personal representative of the President acting under secret instructions and conducting an ex parte examination is entitled to more credence than the official reports of our former minister to Hawaii and of our naval officers, the representations of the representatives of the Hawaiian Government to this country, and the information we have received through unofficial sources from the Christian and intelligent people of Hawaii since the revolution.

It would have been more satisfactory to me and I think to the country if the President had been a little more explicit as to how it is proposed to undo the wrong that it is alleged had been done to Hawaii by those representing us and as to how the Administration proposes to proceed to restore the status existing at the time of our alleged forcible intervention. It would have been more satisfactory if the President had given to the Senate the instructions to our present minister to Hawaii, so that the Senate and the country might have known what was proposed to be done by the Administration in its intervention to restore the monarchy in Hawaii. I think perhaps the President and myself, and possibly the Senate and the country, would have disagreed as to what could be constitutionally done by the Executive of the United States intervening to set up and pull down foreign governments.

But taking this communication in connection with the report of the Secretary of State to the President, I think I am warranted in asserting that it appears to confirm the newspaper reports concerning the policy of the present Administration that force is to be used for the overthrow of the provisional government and for setting up a half-civilized monarchy in Hawaii. Force is the only method by which foreign governments can interfere to create or to destroy a government.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the President the right to exercise it?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Illinois asks, has the President the right to exercise it? I say that undoubtedly if the President had stated what he believed was within his constitutional power in regard to Hawaii there would have been a wide difference of opinion as to the proper construction of the Constitution between the President and myself and the Senate.

Mr. President, I think we are warranted from the message of the President in assuming that something more than moral suasion is to be used to change the government of Hawaii. I consider the utterances of the President as most remarkable, considering the circumstances. What are the circumstances? Just before the close of the last Administration a revolution took place in Hawaii by which the effete, corrupt native monarchy, the existence of which had been possible to that time only by the policy of the United States, which prevented foreign interference and restrained the American influence from accelerating a change in the government, was overthrown. A dissipated, corrupt native queen was deposed and a provisional government representing the intelligence, the wealth, the business interests, the educational, moral and Christian elements in the islands was established.

On account of the preponderance of American interests in the islands and the well known policy of this Government towards them the Provisional Government applied to the United States for political connection. A continuance under a native government so corrupt that legislation was purchased, that justice was corrupted, that personal and property rights were insecure, and so revolutionary that constitutional limitations were disregarded, was longer unendurable; and to secure the reign of law and order, the protection of personal and property rights, and not for personal aggrandizement, the native government was overthrown. As the policy of the United States was well understood to be that no foreign government should acquire the sovereignty of the islands, and if there was to be political connection with any foreign power it should be with the United States, the Provisional Government, to prevent an unnecessary collict between civilization and barbarism, hastened to place itself under the protection of the American flag and to offer the sovereignty of the islands to the United States. Commissioners were appointed to negotiate for the annexation of the islands to the United States.

A treaty was negotiated by President Harrison and transmitted to the Senate for ratification, but the time remaining of the session was too short for its proper consideration. Upon the inauguration of President Cleveland the treaty was withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate, and instead of proceeding to investigate the matter upon the facts already in possession of the Government; instead of calling upon our minister at Hawaii for further information; instead, if the facts were supposed to justify such a course, of recalling our minister and appointing one satisfactory to the Administration, the President resorted to the unusual course of appointing a personal representative to go to Hawaii and investigate affairs with alleged powers paramount to those of a regularly appointed and regularly accredited minister of the United States. The instructions to this personal representative, the scope and extent of his investigation, the character of it, the sources of his information, his report, and his recommendations were kept a profound secret, although the matter was already before the people of the United States, was of great public importance, and was not of such a diplomatic character as to require secrecy.

After eight months of suspense on the part of the people and concealment on the part of the Administration, without any additional light upon the subject, the people were informed that the policy of the Harrison Administration and of every Administration in this country for the last forty years was to be reversed; that the annexation treaty was not again to be submitted to the Senate; that the provisional government of Hawaii was not to be further recognized as the lawful government; and we are at least led to the inference that the Navy of the United States is to be employed to roll back civilization in Hawaii; and that a corrupt, licentious queen, deposed by the Christian and civilized residents of the islands, is to be restored to a throne by American bayonets.

The people of this country were profoundly astonished and disappointed. The nations of Europe who have partitioned out among themselves the islands of the Pacific, and whose grasp has been kept from the Hawaiian group only by the policy of this Government, were perplexed. American and other foreign interests of the islands were alarmed and jeopardized; the friends of good government there were discouraged; and if the policy of the Administration results in restoring the monarchy a great crime against civilization will have been committed.

The people in this country are inquiring as to the cause of this course of the Administration, and there is room for a wide difference of opinion as to how far it has been caused by a desire of the present Administration to discredit the action and policy of its predecessor. The prompt withdrawal of the treaty, the sending of a personal representative to Hawaii under secret instructions, the secrecy by which the whole proceeding has been conducted, the colored, one-sided report at last promulgated by the Administration, all give color to the idea that the purpose of the Administration was early formed, and that all which has since been done has been done simply for the purpose of preparing for the announcement of the policy of the Administration.

It appears as if the Administration had early determined against the annexation of the islands and a provisional government for them, in accordance with that construction of the Constitution which denies to the Federal Government those powers which are necessary for the development of our resources, for the extension and protection of our commerce, for the prosperity of our people, and for assuming among the great powers of the earth that place which our geographical position, our wealth, and our power entitle us to hold.

Mr. President, there was little room for controversy as to the facts between the officials of the present Administration and of the late Administration. All that was done in this matter prior to the inauguration of President Cleveland was done in open day, and is a matter of history. The revolution was public. The Provisional Government was recognized by the representatives of the great powers of earth at Hawaii either the day or the day after it was recognized by Mr. Stevens, our minister, and it is immaterial which. Commissioners were publicly appointed to come to the United States to negotiate for annexation. They came. They mingled with our people. They were interviewed by the reporters of our newspapers. They were received by the Administration. They negotiated a treaty.

Neither Mr. Harrison nor his Secretary of State, a man with large diplomatic experience and learned in international law, nor any member of his Cabinet supposed that the monarchy in Hawaii had been overthrown by our naval forces, that a great wrong had been done to that Government, or that in negotiating for the annexation of the islands we were seeking to take advantage of our own wrong. The people of the United States, who are a just people and would not consent that a wrong should be done to a weak nation, with all the facts before them failed to see that the revolution in Hawaii had not come from natural causes and was not in the interest of civilization and good government. All the investigation that can be had will not greatly change the case as made by the reports of our minister and our naval officers, by the protest of the Queen, and by the representation of the commissioners of Hawaii appointed to treat with this Government.

Mr. Cleveland and his Secretary of State had the means before them at the time the treaty was withdrawn from the Senate to have determined in twenty-four hours the facts in the case and to have determined upon a policy; and, I repeat, it is evident that the course of the Administration in this matter has been for the purpose of preparing the country for a movement by which the action and policy of its predecessor were to be reversed.

Our national interests, the protection of our coasts, the interests of our commerce, the requirements of our Navy, all demand that the United States should not permit the sovereignty of the Hawaiian Islands to pass to any foreign country. Our position in this regard was admirably stated by Secretary Marcy on the 4th of April, 1854, in a dispatch to Mr. Gregg, our commissioner at Hawaii. He said:

> It was foreseen that at some period, not far distant, such a change would take place—

That is, a change in the sovereignty of the Hawaiian Islands—> and that the Hawaiian Islands would come under the protectorate of or be transferred to some foreign power. You were informed that it was not the policy of the United States to accelerate such a change; but if, in the course of events, it became unavoidable, this Governmennt would much prefer to acquire the sovereignty of these islands for the United States, rather than to see it transferred to any other power. If any foreign connection is to be formed, the geographical position of these islands indicates that it should be with us. Our commerce with them far exceeds that of all other countries; our citizens are embarked in the most important business concerns of that country, and some of them hold important public positions. In view of the large American interests there established and the intimate commercial relations existing at this time, it might well be regarded as the duty of this Government to prevent these islands from becoming the appendage of any other foreign power.

> It appears by your dispatches lately received at this Department that the ruling authorities of the Hawaiian Government have become convinced of their inability to sustain themselves any longer as an independent state, and are prepared to throw themselves upon our protection or to seek incorporation into our political system. Fears are entertained by those who favor such a measure that if the United States should manifest a disinclination to receive the proffered sovereignty of this country, the people would seek elsewhere a less desirable connection, or be given over to anarchy.
> The information contained in your last dispatch, No. 10, dated the 7th of February, renders it highly probable that the ruling powers of that Government will have presented to you, as our diplomatic agent, an offer of the sovereignty of their country to the United States. The President has deemed it proper that you should be furnished with instructions for the guidance of your conduct in such an emergency. With this dispatch you will be furnished with a full power to treat with the present authorities of the Hawaiian Government for the transfer of the Sandwich Islands to the United States. This can only be done by a convention or treaty, which will not be valid until it is ratified by the Senate of the United States.
> No intimation has ever been given to this Government as to the terms or conditions which will be likely to be annexed to the tender of the sovereignty. It is presumed, however, that something more than a mere protectorate is contemplated. A protectorate tendered to and accepted by the United States would not change the sovereignty of the country. In that case this Government would take upon itself heavy and responsible duties, for which it could hardly expect compensating advantages.
> I understand that the measure proposed by the people, and that in which the present rulers are disposed to concur, is "annexation" as distinguished from protection; and that it is their intention that these islands shall become a part of our territories and be under the control of this Government as fully as any other of its territorial possessions. In any convention you may make it is expected that the rights to be acquired by the United States should be clearly defined.
> Should the sovereignty of these islands be transferred to the United States, the present Government would, as a matter of course, be superseded, or at least be subjected to the Federal authority of this country.
> It is reasonable to anticipate that the present rulers and chiefs would expect that some provision would be made as compensation to them for the surrender of their political position. This provision could not be, as I conceive, any other than a pecuniary allowance. In this respect the United States would manifest toward them a liberal spirit. Annuities to the amount of $100,000 to be distributed in such manner as they would prefer might be secured to them in the treaty.

This policy, it is believed, has been approved by the people of the United States, it has been acquiesced in by foreign governments, and it has been followed, so far as I know, by every Administration from that time to the present.

It is known that Mr. Gregg negotiated a treaty with the Hawaiian Government for the annexation of the islands to the United States, a draft of which was sent to our Government; and although it contained two provisions—one for the admission of the islands as a State of the Union, and another increasing the amount of the annuities to be paid to $300,000—that were not approved by the Administration, it was agreed to by the native king and by his advisers, and would have received the royal signature except for the fact that the king suddenly died and Prince Alexander succeeded to the throne.

If you will take a map of the Pacific Ocean and examine it, you will see that, as was stated by Mr. Marcy, the geographical position of these islands is such that if they are to have political connection with any foreign power it should be with us. They lie in the route of commerce from Australia, from China and Japan to the western coast of this continent; they are so geographically situated as to give them a commanding naval and commercial importance. Their possession by the United States would make them a means of defense to our coast, and would give us a convenient naval and commercial station. Their possession by any foreign country would make them a constant menace to our commerce and our coast, another place where, as at Bermuda and Halifax and Esquimault, a hostile fleet could lie in safety and menace our coast and our commerce.

Great Britain already has control of Australia, New Zealand, part of New Guinea, and of the Fiji Islands in the South Pacific, Hongkong and Singapore on the Asiatic coast, and British Columbia on the western coast of North America. France has the Society Islands, the Marquesas groups lying north of Tahita, a portion of the Leeward Islands, New Caledonia, near Australia, one or two of the New Hebrides Islands, and Hué, on the coast of Cochin China. Germany lays a protectorate claim over the Marshall Islands, part of New Guinea, and two or three islands near the Equator. Russia has the undisputed possession of the Asiatic coast from Bering Sea and Kamchatka to Corea and China. Spain owns the Philippine Islands and about one hundred islands of the Caroline Group. The Dutch Netherlands have naval and waiting stations at Java, Sumatra, and Borneo. Portugal owns the Ladrone Islands.

It will be seen that the European nations have partitioned out among themselves all the islands of the Pacific but the Samoan Islands and the Sandwich group.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. I will.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator to be arguing in favor of the policy on the part of this Government of making the Hawaiian Islands a colony under what is known in Europe as the continental system?

Mr. DOLPH. I will come to that directly, and will explain precisely what I think should be done. I am in favor of the annexation of the islands. I am in favor of giving them a stable, good government, and exercising control over them.

As I said, it will be seen that the leading European nations have partitioned out among themselves the islands of the Pacific, except the Samoan Islands and the Sandwich Islands. By the vigorous foreign policy of the Harrison Administration the appropriation of the Samoan Islands by Germany was prevented, and a protectorate was created over them by Germany, Great Britain, and the United States.

The Hawaiian group alone of all the islands in the Pacific Ocean which are worth contending for remains. It affords the only opportunity for the United States to secure a suitable naval and commercial station in the Pacific Ocean, and an outpost for our defense. When the prize that our eminent statesmen had looked forward to for half a century is honorably laid at our feet upon our own terms and in a manner conducive of the best interests of all the residents of Hawaii, native and foreign, it is spurned with contempt.

Mr. President, if all that is claimed by the Administration concerning the manner in which the Provisional Government was established in Hawaii be true, still all that the United States could properly do would be to withdraw its moral and physical support of the Provisional Government, and allow it to stand or fall by itself or to apply to other foreign governments for aid and protection. Forcible interference for the purpose of overthrowing the established Government would be so flagrant a violation of the principles of international law and of justice that foreign governments would be justified in interfering for the preservation of the existing Government and for the protection of personal and property rights in the islands.

Our policy in regard to these islands, maintained for half a century, is perfectly defensible, and has been and will be acquiesced in by foreign nations; but the United States should not be permitted to act the dog in the manger. If we will not, when there is ample justification and opportunity, interfere to give the islands good government and for the protection of American interests, we should get out of the way, and leave the intelligent population of the islands to apply elsewhere for protection. The moral sentiment of the world will justify the United States in asserting a better right to the annexation of the islands, or to a protectorate over them, than that of any other foreign country, and even to our interference on a proper occasion to give the islands good government; but it will most emphatically condemn actual forcible interference to fasten upon the intelligent, enterprising property-holding class of the islands a corrupt and plundering native monarchy.

If we may judge from the report of the Secretary of State to the President, from the President's message, and from all the information which the Administration has deigned to give us upon the subject, to the present time, the President has set himself up as an umpire to overthrow and set up foreign governments, and has assumed the power to revolutionize by force the Government of Hawaii, to overthrow a republic and set up a monarchy, to make war upon a friendly government recognized by all the great powers of the world, and that without consulting Congress and without previous notice.

Mr. GRAY. Am I to infer from what the Senator says that the present Government in Hawaii is a republic?

Mr. DOLPH. Well, it comes as near to that as anything.

Mr. GRAY. How near does it come to that?

Mr. DOLPH. I am not going to stop to discuss that question now. I will call it a republic, and when the Senator speaks, if he wants to criticise me, he can do so. It is at least a Government established by the people; it is no monarchy, that is certain; and that is sufficient for my present purpose.

Mr. GRAY. It is certain that it is not a republic.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. How many people established that Government?

Mr. DOLPH. As many as ever established any Government on the islands. Fifteen hundred people met in public meeting, men who pay the taxes and represent the moral and Christian elements of the islands.

I do not wish to be diverted into a discussion of these things. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber will have ample opportunity, I apprehend, before this session of Congress is over to discuss the subject to their satisfaction.

Mr. GRAY. I am sorry I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

Mr. GRAY. It seems to be rather a disturbing question.

Mr. DOLPH. No, but it interrupts the line of thought which I was pursuing.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DOLPH. If we may judge from the information we have, it appears that the President has assumed that the Executive of this Government has a right to use the naval forces for the purpose of carrying out his unconstitutional and illegal designs. After eight months of deliberation, when Congress had been in session nearly three months of the time, and might have been consulted, the policy of the Administration is announced at a time so chosen that there can be no Congressional interference, and apparently nothing in the way of carrying out the long-concealed scheme of the Administration.

Claus Spreckels, a man who has grown rich off of the ignorant, improvident natives of the islands, from his connection with the deposed native Government, and on account of our improvident treaty with the islands, appears to have had more influence with the Administration than the thousand other Americans, residents of Hawaii, not basking in the smiles of the native queen, whose property interests are jeopardized by the native Government.

The whole course of the Administration on this subject has been most extraordinary. The purpose of the Administration is still obscure. The instructions to the present minister to Hawaii have not been made public, and every intimation of the purpose of the Administration was withheld until the late minister had sailed from San Francisco, and there was no longer any means by which the representatives of the Hawaiian Government to this country could communicate to their Government. There has been no administrative act in the history of this country so extraordinary, so censurable, so palpably unconstitutional, and so flagrantly in violation of the principles of international law as the supposed policy of the Administration towards the present Government of the Hawaiian Islands. If it is true that force is to be used to suppress the present Government, it is worse than war; it is worse than piracy, as it was designated by Hon. John A. Kasson in an interview published in the press, because pirates hoist the black flag and give notice of their intention to strike. It would more resemble assassination.

The report of the present Secretary of State to the President and the message of the President substantially charges, and that on the report of a personal agent of the President, acting under secret instructions and conducting an ex parte investigation, that our late minister to Hawaii and an able and patriotic officer of our Navy, since dead, conspired to overthrow the constitutional Government of Hawaii, and President Harrison, his distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Foster, the other members of his Cabinet, and a majority of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations with having been willing to approve a great wrong and to take advantage of it by annexing the islands; but, sir, reflections upon the late Administration are uncalled for and unpatriotic.

I have been surprised to see the action of the British Government when Lord George Paulet, commander of Her Majesty's ship Carysfort, compelled by force the Hawaiian King to cede the islands to England, cited by the newspapers as a precedent for the action of the Administration. In that case a British naval officer stationed at Hawaii, by the most arbitrary course and by force, compelled the native king to do many illegal and unjust things in regard to certain pretended rights of British subjects, and at last compelled him to cede the sovereignty of the islands to Great Britain. The king complied under force, under protest, and under duress, and immediately applied to the United States and Great Britain for redress of his wrongs.

Under the forcible protest of our Government the British Government disavowed the act of its naval officer, it having just treated with the principal powers of Europe, and I think with the United States, for the independence of the islands, and the king was left in possession of his dominions. There had been no change of Government; there was no Government to be overthrown. There had been an illegal seizure of the islands by a naval officer, and his act was disavowed by his Government.

Mr. President, previous Administrations have not been as adverse to territorial acquisition or as careful about the manner in which they are made as the present Administration. When the opportunity to purchase Louisiana occurred, President Jefferson, who declared that there was no power in the Federal Government to purchase territory, did not fail to act; and although Spain, which appeared to have a secret treaty with Napoleon at the time of the transfer of Louisiana from France to the United States that the territory should not be transferred, protested. Although the purchase of the territory was savagely attacked by the enemies of the Administration on the grounds of objection stated by Jefferson himself, the President called an extraordinary session of Congress for the 17th of October. Two days later the treaty was ratified, and ten days after a joint resolution was passed by Congress to carry the treaty into effect.

We put our own construction on the cession of Louisiana from Spain to France as regards the eastern boundary, Spain contending that the eastern boundary was the Mississippi River, and we enforced our construction by military occupation of the disputed territory. We demonstrated to Spain that she held Florida at our pleasure, and made the acquisition of Florida by the United States possible by military expeditions into Florida territory for one purpose or another.

Our people went to Texas and helped to organize there the revolution by which Texas was withdrawn from Mexico, and notwithstanding that our people were divided in sentiment about the admission of Texas into the Union, we admitted Texas in spite of the protest of Mexico.

The Mexican war was largely a party measure, and the people were divided in sentiment as to whether it was justified. It was not made for conquest, but it resulted in a large acquisition of territory.

As long as slavery existed the public men of the South were determined that the United States should annex Cuba. If I had time, I could cite history to show that they were not so very particular about the occasion which was to enable us to do so.

In acquiring Alaska we set the precedent for acquiring territory not contiguous to our own. We acquired from Russia a territory containing nearly 500,000 square miles, with about 35,000 native population and a very few white inhabitants, a territory which will probably never be ready for admission as a State into the Union, and whose military and commercial importance is not far greater than that of the Sandwich Islands.

Our citizens went to Oregon Territory, which we laid claim to on account of the discovery of Capt. Gray, and settled there. We treated with Great Britain for the joint occupation of it. American citizens raised the American flag, constituted a state, and formed a provisional government, and we gave the Territory a Territorial government long before any effort had been made to treat with the Indians for the cession of the soil or for the extinguishment of their rights.

The treaty negotiated by President Harrison for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands was a treaty of annexation only, providing for the political control of them until Congress could act, and leaving the future government of the islands entirely to Congress. Statehood was not demanded or expected. If annexation were desirable, there could not have been framed a better or a more favorable treaty to the United States. Even a full territorial government would not have been required.

The government of Alaska is a very limited government, and in my judgment, in some respects, a very defective one. We shall have to provide for Alaska and all territory so situated, that it is not likely within any reasonable time to become a State of the Union, a form of government more simple and less cumbersome, reserving to the Federal Government more legislative and executive power than under the ordinary territorial government.

The control and government of Hawaii would have given us no trouble. Our flag would have protected their people from foreign interference; a single company of militia or a naval vessel, which could have been profitably stationed there for other purposes, would have preserved domestic order, and the resources and the revenues of the islands would have been sufficient to maintain the local government, to provide for general education, and to have contributed a fair share to the National Treasury.

Seventy-one years ago President Monroe, after long and careful deliberation and consultation with his Cabinet, stated in his annual message the doctrine which has since been known by his name concerning the interference of European powers with political affairs on this continent. I shall not encumber the RECORD by reading all that he said on that subject. A few brief quotations will be sufficient to show the character and extent of the doctrine.

I should say the occasion for the announcement of the Monroe doctrine was the proposed intervention by the allied powers of Europe, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, for the purpose of restoring the revolted colonies of Spain on this continent to the control of the mother country.

President Monroe said:

The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

The reasons for this declaration and the construction which has since been put upon it by our Government extends it to the islands of both oceans, which are situated so near to the continent as to be of especial naval and commercial importance. In October, 1824, it was applied to Cuba and Porto Rico. Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, in a dispatch to Mr. Brown, our minister to France, stated the position of the United States concerning these two islands as follows:

In the same spirit, and with the hope of guarding beforehand against any possible difficulties on that subject that may arise, you will now add that we could not consent to the occupation of those islands—by any other European power than Spain under any contingency whatever. Cherishing no designs on them ourselves, we have a fair claim to an unreserved knowledge of the views of other great maritime powers in respect to them.

That is Cuba and Porto Rico—

This doctrine has been frequently applied to the Sandwich Islands.

President Tyler, in his annual message of December, 1842, Mr. Webster being Secretary of State, said concerning the Sandwich Islands:

Just emerging from a state of barbarism, the government of the islands is as yet feeble, but its dispositions appear to be just and pacific, and it seems anxious to improve the condition of its people by the introduction of religious and moral institutions, means of education, and the arts of civilized life. It can not but be in conformity with the wishes of the Government and the people of the United States, that the community thus existing, in the midst of a vast expanse of ocean, should be respected, and all its rights strictly and conscientiously regarded. And this must also be the true interest of all other commercial states.

Far remote from the dominions of European powers, its growth and prosperity, as an independent state, may yet be in a high degree useful to all whose trade is extended to those regions; while its nearer approach to this continent and the intercourse which American vessels have with it—such vessels constituting five-sixths of all which annually visit it—could not but create dissatisfaction on the part of the United States at any attempt by another power, should such an attempt be threatened or feared, to take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native government. Considering, therefore, that the United States possess so very large a share of the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that their Government seeks, nevertheless, no exclusive control over the Hawaiian Government, but is content with its independent existence, and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity. Its forbearance in this respect, under the circumstances of the very large intercourse of their citizens with the islands, would justify this Government, should events hereafter arise to require it, in making a decided remonstrance against the adoption of an opposite policy by any other power.

President Taylor, in his message of December 4, 1849, said:

The position of the Sandwich Islands with reference to the territory of the United States on the Pacific, the success of our perserving and benevolent citizens who have repaired to that remote quarter in Christianizing the natives and inducing them to adopt a system of government and laws suited to their capacity and wants, and the use made by our numerous whale ships of the harbors of the islands as places of resort for obtaining refreshment and repairs, all combine to render their destiny peculiarly interesting to us.

It is our duty to encourage the authorities of these islands in their efforts to improve and elevate the moral and political condition of the inhabitants; and we should make reasonable allowances for the difficulties inseparable from this task. We desire that the islands may maintain their independence, and that other nations should concur with us in this sentiment.

We could in no event be indifferent to their passing under the dominion of any other power.

The principal commercial states have in this a common interest, and it is to be hoped that no one of them will attempt to interpose obstacles to the entire independence of the islands. * * *

President Johnson, in his message of December 9, 1868, said:

It is known and felt by the Hawaiian Government and people that their government and institutions are feeble and precarious; that the United States being so near a neighbor, would be unwilling to see the islands pass under foreign control.

I will also insert, without reading, an extract from a dispatch from Secretary Blaine, dated November 19, 1881, to our American minister at Hawaii:

But if negotiations such as you describe are really in progress—

Negotiations to induce the Hawaiian Government to withdraw from the reciprocity treaty with us—

you will ask for an interview with the secretary for foreign affairs and make the following representation of the views of the United States:

The Government of the United States has with unvarying consistency manifested respect for the Hawaiian Kingdom and an earnest desire for the welfare of its people. * * *

The Government of the United States has always avowed, and now repeats, that under no circumstances will it permit the transfer of the territory or sovereignty of these islands to any of the great European powers. It is needless to restate the reasons upon which that determination rests. It is too obvious for argument that the possession of these islands by a great maritime power would not only be a dangerous diminution of the just and necessary influence of the United States in the waters of the Pacific, but in case of international difficulty it would be a positive threat to interests too large and important to be lightly risked. * * *

I also submit an extract from another dispatch from Secretary Blaine, dated December 1, 1882:

The United States was one of the first among the great nations of the world to take active interest in upbuilding Hawaiian independence and the creation of political life for its people. It has consistently endeavored, and with success, to enlarge the material prosperity of Hawaii. On such an independent basis it proposes to be equally unremitting in its efforts hereafter to maintain and develop the advantages which accrued to Hawaii, and draw closer the ties which imperatively unite her to the great body of the American commonwealth. In this line of action the United States does its simple duty both to Hawaii and itself, and it can not permit such obvious neglect of national interest as would be involved by silent acquiescence in any movement looking to a lessening of those amenities and the substitution of alien and hostile interests. It firmly believes the position of the Hawaiian Islands, as a key to the dominion of the American Pacific, demands neutrality, to which end it will earnestly cooperate with the native Government, and if through any cause the maintenance of such position, neutrality, should be found by Hawaii impracticable, this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking avowedly an American solution of the grave issues presented.

I also submit an extract from a report of Mr. Secretary Fish, accompanying President Grant's message to the Senate of July 14, 1870:

It was at the period of the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle and of Laybach, when the "holy alliance" was combined to arrest all political changes in Europe in the sense of liberty, when they were intervening in Southern Europe for the reestablishment of absolutism, and when they were meditating interference to check the progress of free government in America, that Mr. Monroe, in his annual message of December, 1823, declared that the United States would consider any attempt to extend the European system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. "With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power," he said, "we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling, in any other manner, their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly feeling toward the United States."

This declaration resolved the solution of the immediate question of the independence of the Spanish-American colonies, and is supposed to have exercised some influence upon the course of the British cabinet in regard to the absolutist schemes in Europe as well as in America.

It has also exercised a permanent influence on this continent. It was at once invoked in consequence of the supposed peril of Cuba on the side of Europe; it was applied to a similar danger threatening Yucatan; it was embodied in the treaty of the United States and Great Britain as to Central America; it produced the successful opposition of the United States to the attempt of Great Brirain to exercise dominion in Nicaragua under the cover of the Mosquito Indians; and it operated in like manner to prevent the establishment of a European dynasty in Mexico.

The United States stands solemnly committed by repeated declarations and repeated acts to this doctrine, and its application to the affairs of this continent. In his message to the two Houses of Congress at the commencement of the present session, the President, following the teachings of all our history, said that the existing "dependencies are no longer regarded as subject to transfer from one European power to another. When the present relation of colonies ceases, they are to become independent powers, exercising the right of choice and of self-control in the determination of their future condition and relations with other powers."

The policy is not a policy of aggression; but it opposes the creation of European dominion on American soil, or its transfer to other European powers, and it looks hopefully to the time when, by the voluntary departure of European governments from this continent and the adjacent islands, America shall be wholly American.

It does not contemplate forcible intervention in any legitimate contest; but it protests against permitting such a contest to result in the increase of European power or influence; and it ever impels this Government, as in the late contest between the South American Republics and Spain, to interpose its good offices to secure an honorable peace.

I also submit an extract from a dispatch of Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, dated July 12, 1887, on the subject of the Hawaiian Islands. It is a dispatch to our minister at Hawaii.

Whilst we abstain from interference with the domestic affairs of Hawaii, in accordance with the policy and practice of this Government, yet obstruction to the channels of legitimate commerce under existing treaty must not be allowed, and American citizens in Hawaii must be protected in their persons and property by the representatives of their country's law and power, and no internal discord must be suffered to impair them. Your own aid and counsel, as well as the assistance of the officers of our Government vessels, if found necessary, will therefore be promptly afforded to promote the reign of law and respect for orderly government in Hawaii.

As is well known, no intent is cherished or policy entertained by the United States which is otherwise than friendly to the autonomical control and independence of Hawaii, and no other member of the family of nations has so great and immediate an interest in the welfare and prosperity of Hawaii on such a basis as this Republic.

In regard to the Hawaiian Islands the policy of the United States has not only been that the sovereignty of the islands should not pass to any foreign country, but if the islands were to form a political connection with any foreign country it should be with us. While we have not been willing to force annexation or hasten the evident coming of the time when Hawaii would apply to the United States for political connection, as evidenced by the dispatch which I read from Secretary Marcy to Mr. Gregg, of April 4, 1854, the eventual annexation of the islands has been looked forward to. It has become more and more evident that with the decreasing native population of the islands and the increase of the naturalized citizens and white residents of the islands, the increase of wealth, the multiplication of industries, in a word, with the growth of civilization in the islands, the time would come when the progressive, civilized, property-holding inhabitants of the islands would be no longer content to be governed by a native monarchy, and every one has had a right to believe that while our Government would not hasten revolution in the islands, it would not be the last to recognize revolution accomplished, and would not, when it could honorably do so, refuse to accept the sovereignty of the islands.

The revolution in Hawaii, in my judgment, was brought about by causes which had been in operation for many years. It was the natural result of that law by which, whenever civilization and barbarism come in conflict, civilization prevails. Every step toward civilization in the islands has been brought about by Christian missionaries and by the influence of foreign residents of the islands; and the civilization of the islands to-day is mainly represented by the population of foreign birth. Ever since the islands were discovered by Capt. Cook, in 1798, the native population, owing to their dissipated habits, have been constantly decreasing, and to-day it is less than the foreign population of the islands. It is unfit for self-government, and the forcible subjection of the personal and property rights of the intelligent and progressive people of Hawaii to a native Government would be a great outrage.

The course of civilization in Hawaii has been but a repetition of the course of civilization in this country. Civilization, impelled by a natural law ever since the first settlement on the Atlantic coast, has gradually spread westward, and savage life has disappeared before it until a continent once occupied only by wandering tribes of Indians, engaged in perpetual warfare, has become the home of 67,000,000 industrious, civilized people. While we may not approve of some of the methods by which this transformation has been wrought, we must accept it as inevitable and as having taken place in accordance with an imperative law of the world's progress.

Mr. President, this is not the first time the people have been disappointed by the foreign policy of Mr. Cleveland—a snail-like policy, a policy that confines a nation within its own boundaries. When Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1885, there was pending a treaty between the United States and Nicaragua by which the United States was granted the right to construct, operate, and control a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific across the territory of Nicaragua. Upon the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland he withdrew the treaty from the Senate and never submitted it again to that body, and our opportunity to secure the construction of that canal, the control of it to the United States, and its capitalization at cost was lost. I will not dwell upon the causes of the defeat of that treaty or the great national loss caused thereby.

The project had received the favorable consideration of nearly every Administration for three-quarters of a century. It was a project which if carried out would have been immensely beneficial to our commerce. It would have accelerated the development of our resources. It would have added to the value of every product of the Pacific coast, and by enabling us to utilize Lake Nicaragua for a naval station would have doubled the effectiveness of our Navy and would have saved its cost to the United States in a comparatively brief period by lessening the necessary annual expenditures for the Navy. If Mr. Cleveland had favored that treaty it would have been ratified, and to-day the canal might have been in successful operation, dispensing its blessings to the people of this country and to the world.

If that canal should be built by private parties it would be at a ruinous cost. It would necessarily be capitalized for several times its cost, and the tolls and charges would be so great as to largely offset the advantage of the shorter route for commerce. Work has been suspended on the canal, and it is more than probable that the present company may be compelled to surrender its concessions to Nicaragua, and a way may be opened for the United States to secure the right to construct and control the canal, but under the do-nothing policy of this Administration the opportunity would no doubt be lost.

We need an aggressive foreign policy. We need a reaffirmation of the Monroe doctrine as it is popularly understood applied not only to the continent of America but to those islands which are situated so near our coast as to be of great commercial and naval importance. We need an aggressive policy for the purpose of extending and protecting our commerce, and securing closer relations with South American republics—a policy which, if necessity requires, extends and is enforced beyond our own boundaries, a policy, in fact, which goes with our citizens and with our flag wherever they may lawfully go, and a policy which would give us a commanding position among the great powers of the world commensurate with our geographical situation and our wealth and power.

The question of the future control of the Sandwich Islands is a question of national importance, affecting our national safety, the interest of our commerce, the requirements of our Navy, the protection of American citizens; but the Pacific coast, on account of its geographical position, has an especial interest in it. With a seacoast line of over 1,600 miles, not including Alaska, with one of the greatest inland seas upon the face of the globe, with a fruitful soil and varied climate, with vast and valuable forests, with mines of precious and useful metals, with great resources as yet almost altogether undeveloped, situated nearer the markets of the Orient and of the islands of the Pacific by 3,000 miles than the Atlantic and the Gulf coast, our foreign and coastwise commerce, when our great resources shall be developed, will be scarcely less important than that of the Atlantic.

In contending for the trade of the trans-Pacific countries we must contend with those European countries which have partitioned out among themselves the islands of the Pacific, which will control their harbors and their commerce, and especially with Great Britain, which has for the purpose of controlling the commerce of the Pacific constructed at an estimated cost of $142,000,000 the intercolonial railroad connecting the maritime provinces of the Canadian Dominion with Halifax and Quebec, and has constructed the Canadian Pacific to connect Quebec and Halifax with Puget Sound, and is, in connection with the Dominion Government, by subsidies maintaining a British steamship line between the terminus of the Canadian Pacific on Puget Sound and Australia and the coasts of China and Japan.

In contending for our fair share of this commerce we shall have for all time to contend with that system of subsidies, of aid to their foreign commerce, maintained by Great Britain and other foreign nations. A wise statesmanship will endeavor to forecast the situation, to make provision by law to so far as possible place American commerce on an equality with the commerce of foreign countries.

The tide of immigration and civilization is still westward, impelled by a law as imperative as the laws of nature. It has swept across the continent, leaving along its course on mountain and in valley, on hillside and upon plain, great cities and towns and a civilized population, and will find its culminating point upon the shores of the Pacific.

The people of the Pacific coast in all that makes a people great and prosperous are the equals of their kindred of the East. In the disposition of all great questions affecting our future prosperity, and especially the extension and protection of our commerce, the Pacific coast, on account of its geographical position, its present condition and necessities, and its future development, should receive fair consideration.

Mr. President, I take issue with the President that the report of his personal representative, Mr. Blount, shows beyond question, or at all, that the revolution in Hawaii was brought about by the interference of the American minister or by the interference of our naval forces. I have read Mr. Blount's report and the evidence accompanying it, and I have read Minister Stevens's report and his statement and the other information which could be derived from the press. The report of Mr. Blount reads more like the plea of a zealous lawyer for his side of a controversy than like the unprejudiced and impartial decision of a judge.

As for myself, I would sooner take the statement of Mr. Stevens, a man who has reached his seventy-third year and has served twelve years in honorable foreign positions under this Government, a man of standing and intelligence; I would sooner take the statement of Mr. Thurston, the representative of the Hawaiian Government here; I would sooner take the statement of the honorable men who were engaged in the revolution and know not only what was done, but what the intention of the parties was; I would sooner take the testimony that comes to us from the enlightened and Christian portion of the community in Hawaii, than to take the one-sided, colored report of Mr. Blount and the statement of the President in regard to affairs in Hawaii. I would prefer the statement of our minister and of these respectable men to that of all the admirers of the dissolute queen and of all the parasites who lived and thrived upon the native government.

I will state what I consider to be the true case in regard to Hawaii by submitting first to be incorporated in my remarks the dispatch of Minister Stevens of January 18, 1893, to the Secretary of State, being his official report:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Honolulu, H. I., January 18, 1893.
(Via San Francisco, January 28. Received January 28.)

Events in Hawaii in the past few days have moved rapidly. An entire overthrow of the Hawaiian monarchy and the establishment of a provisional government in the interest of the whole people of the islands without the sacrifice of a single life. The new government is in full possession of the islands and was promptly recognized by all the diplomatic representatives. The four men of whom it is composed are of high character, one of whom resigned his position as one of the supreme judges to assume the place. Full dispatches by the mail leaving Honolulu to-day by special steamer.

STEVENS, United States Minister.

UNITED STATES LEGATION.
Honolulu, January 18, 1893. (Received February 3.)

SIR: In my 73 of November 8 I gave full information of the surrender of the Queen to the wishes of the Legislature by the formation of a ministry composed of men of intelligence and wealth, possessing the entire confidence of the business men and the more responsible citizens of the country. But this surrender of the Queen and of those surrounding her was only seeming. As soon as the principal appropriations had been voted and the legislative work nearly concluded, several of the best members having already left for their homes, a remarkable conspiracy was revealed.

The undersigned, for the first time since he has been at the head of this legation, January 4 took passage for Hilo and the volcano on the United States Steamer Boston for the benefit of the health of himself and of his daughter, it being also desirable that the town of the second importance in the islands should have this attention at the time the Boston was making a visit to Hawaii, the chief island in the group. Beyond all doubt, immediately after the Boston and myself had left Honolulu the unscrupulous adventurers around the Queen improved the opportunity to push through the Legislature an astounding lottery franchise with the obvious intent to sell it out to the Louisiana lottery men. This was worked by some of the same parties supposed to be of the powerful opium ring whose four points of operation are Vancouver, San Francisco, Honolulu, and Hongkong. They distributed the lottery stock among the native members of the Legislature in large figures.

Notwithstanding the strong opposition of all the best people of the islands, including whites and natives, and the emphatic opposition of the chamber of commerce, the Queen and her palace favorite gave their warmest support to the lottery bill and signed it at once. She was to be immediately compensated by being allowed to proclaim a new constitution, restoring to the Crown the old despotic prerogatives in direct violation of the existing constitution, which provides for the only mode of change, which is by the action of successive legislatures.

Returning on the Boston from our Hilo trip on the 14th instant, we found the Legislature was to be prorogued at 12 a. m., one-half hour after my arrival at the legation. The prorogation completed, members of the Legislature, diplomatic corps, judges of the supreme court and other officials went to the palace by invitation. In the mean time it began to be known in public circles, that it was the Queen's intention to proclaim the revolutionary constitution. This resulted in raising an excitement which alarmed her confidants and caused some of them to draw back. This consumed time, so that she could not secure the signatures of her new cabinet as she had expected. In the mean time the diplomatic corps grew weary and left the palace, realizing that the invitation to be present was a trick.

THE QUEEN'S DETERMINATION.

As I had just returned, weary from my voyage, I had not received the invitation, the chamberlain knowing I was absent when he invited the English, Portuguese, French, and Japanese diplomatic representatives the day before. In the short meanwhile I had suspicioned the trick. Finally, the Queen appeared in the throne room, before the supreme judges and other officials, in an extreme passion of anger, and avowed her purpose to postpone her revolutionary constitution for a brief period, and then went upon the balcony and spoke with great passion in the same strain to those around the palace, principally her retainers and the royal guard, her determination to proclaim her constitution at another time. What I have described as to the lottery legislation, the forcing out of the responsible cabinet of November 3, and appointing the lottery cabinet, two of whom had been voted out of the ministry during the legislative session by a two-thirds vote for the best of reasons. It was the lottery bribe and the autocratic design of the Queen that quickly precipitated events.

A mass meeting of the citizens was called to meet on Monday, the 16th, at 2 p. m., which assembled in the largest hall in the city. Short as was the notice, over 1,300 of the principal citizens of Honolulu and from other islands, who happened to be in the city, were in attendance. This meeting included merchants, bankers, professional men, the principal business men, and the mechanics, the chief German and some of the leading English merchants and other nationalities, as well as American residents. It is said such an assemblage was never before equaled in Honolulu. Intelligent American visitors here say that such a public meeting would do credit to a meeting of a similar class of citizens in our best American cities.

The assemblage was a unit in feeling and purpose. The speeches and resolutions are on the printed slips I herewith inclose. This remarkable uprising of the best citizens, including nearly all of the chief property holders, the Tahitian marshal and palace favorite did not dare attempt to suppress. A committee of public safety was at once created to meet the emergency and to prevent anarchy and riot. It was fortunate that the Boston was in the harbor. The committee on public safety called on me for aid. I promptly addressed to the commander of the Boston, Capt. G. S. Wiltse, the following note:

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Honolulu, January 16, 1893.

SIR: In view of the existing critical circumstances in Honolulu, including an inadequate legal force, I request you to land marines and sailors from the ship under your command for the protection of the United States legation and United States consulate and to secure the safety of American life and property.

Very truly yours,

JOHN L. STEVENS,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

A copy of the call of the committee of public safety for aid is inclosed.

Promptly the men from the Boston were landed. Detachments were placed around the legation and the consulate, the principal members having marched to a central hall for shelter and headquarters; the night being at hand, the public anxiety being especially strong as to what might be done by irresponsible persons in the night, the landing of the men of the Boston so promptly gave immediate relief to the public anxiety.

THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.

As soon as practicable a provisional government was constituted, composed of four highly respectable men, with Judge Dole at the head, he having resigned his place on the supreme bench to assume this responsibility. He was born in Honolulu of American parentage, educated here and in the United States, and is of the highest reputation among all citizens, both natives and whites. P. C. Jones is a native of Boston, Mass., wealthy, possessing property interests in the islands, and a resident here for many years. The other two members are of the highest respectability. The committee of public safety forthwith took possession of the government buildings, archives, and treasury, and installed the provisional government at the heads of the respective departments. This being an accomplished fact, I promptly recognized the provisional government as the de facto government of the Hawaiian Islands. The English minister, the Portuguese chargé d'affaires, the French and the Japanese commissioners promptly did the same; these, with myself, being the only members of the diplomatic corps residing there.

All is quiet here now. Without the sacrifice of a single life this change of government has been accomplished. Language can hardly express the enthusiasm and the profound feeling of relief at this peaceful and salutary change of government. The underlying cause of this profound feeling among the citizens is the hope that the United States Government will allow these islands to pass to American control and become American soil. A commission of citizens, duly accredited, will go by the steamer that takes this dispatch to Washington to state the wishes of the provisional government and of the responsible people of the islands and to give a complete account of the existing state of things here.

It is proper that I should add that the presence of the Boston here has been of the highest importance and the behavior of officers and men has been admirable. Capt. Wiltse has exercised prudence and great firmness, while he and the undersigned have recognized only accomplished facts and have not allowed the use of the United States force for any but the most conservative reasons.

I am, sir,

JOHN L. STEVENS.

I submit also a subsequent statement made by Mr. Stevens and recently published in the press:

[Washington Post, November 30.]

BLOUNT GIVEN THE LIE—EX-MINISTER STEVENS SHARPLY CRITICISES HIS REPORT—HIS STATEMENTS FLATLY DENIED—THE COMMISSIONER CHARACTERIZED AS A DIPLOMATIC NEOPHYTE CAUGHT IN THE SNARES LAID FOR HIM BY LILIUOKALANI'S ADVISERS—HE AND SECRETARY GRESHAM ACCUSED OF PLAYING INTO BRITISH HANDS—SOME OBSERVATIONS ABOUT THE MEN AT HONOLULU.

AUGUSTA, ME., November 29.

Ex-Minister Stevens has given out the following as his reply to the position of Commissioner Blount on Hawaiian affairs:

"A deep sense of obligation to my country and an American's duty to defend an insulted, threatened, and struggling American colony, planted as righteously and firmly on the North Pacific isles as our Pilgrim Fathers established themselves on Plymouth Rock, demand that I shall make an answer to the astounding misrepresentations and untruths of Commissioner Blount's report on Hawaiian affairs, a copy of which I first obtained, with difficulty, Saturday evening, November 25.

"It is proper for me to preface my answer by briefly alluding to the fact that those familiar with international rules and proceedings and who have had diplomatic experience must be astonished that Secretary Gresham and his commissioner should make before the world such a persistent effort to discredit the recent agents of the department they now represent, and which was once represented by Thomas Jefferson, William L. Marcy, William H. Seward, and James G. Blaine. The general adoption of such a policy by our department of foreign affairs could not fail to weaken greatly our influence with foreign countries in any future effort and serve to make the American diplomatic service contemptible in the eyes of the world.

PLAYING INTO BRITISH HANDS.

"Not only is the course of Gresham and Blount extremely un-American in its spirit, but it is also in direct opposition to the civilizing and Christianizing influence on the Hawaiian islands, while it is playing into British hands, in direct opposition of the efforts of the American Board of Missions, and to the American Government for more than sixty years, in all of which period there has been a uniform, continuous, and patriotic American policy. I may also make a preliminary remark regarding the repeatedly asserted opinion of those who have assailed my official action that I was prepared for and stimulated to it by the accomplished and thoroughly American statesman who occupied the Department of State most of the period of President Harrison's Administration. It is sufficient to say that this expressed surmise is utterly without foundation. What I know and state on this point accords with what ex-Secretary Tracy has evidently asserted in that regard. Still more, I may properly add that the lines of official duty, as followed by myself and Capt. Wiltse and the course of the Administration and of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in the critical Hawaiian days of January and February last were exactly on the lines marked out by Secretary Marcy in 1854, and by Secretary Bayard in his dispatch to Minister Merrill July 12, 1887. Marcy's instructions and draft of treaty provided for annexation; Bayard's instructions of 1887 held the United States minister and naval commander at Honolulu responsible for the protection of American life and property and the 'preservation of public order.'

A DIPLOMATIC NEOPHYTE.

"So much as a necessary introduction to my consideration of the Blount report. Not wishing to be severe on a neophyte in diplomacy, with but little knowledge of the world's affairs outside of his own country, sent on a very peculiar errand amid currents and quicksands entirely unknown to him, he has been partly the victim of circumstances, having been caught in the meshes and snares adroitly prepared for him by the cunning advisers of the fallen Liliuokalani, and by the shrewd, sharp, long-experienced British diplomatic agent, whose aims and hopes Blount has served so well, and without the least suspicion that he was aiding ultra-British interests, even more than he was helping the Hawaiian monarchists and the justly dethroned Queen. It is clear enough from Blount's manner on the day of his arrival at Honolulu, as well as by his letter to the Department of State, written shortly after, that he designed, at whatever cost, to repudiate the views and action of the recently terminated Administration, and that in order to do so he must impugn the action of Minister Stevens and of the commander of the United States ship Boston.

UNDER ROYAL ESPIONAGE.

"A total stranger, it was impossible for Mr. Blount to know how unfitting it was for him to take up his quarters where he was certain to be surrounded by royalists, and where the supporters of the Provisional Government would be reluctant to go. The hotel was kept by one who had served as Kalakaua's chamberlain, who was one of the principal persons in a syndicate that had cheated the Hawaiian Government out of nearly $100,000, a transaction which Minister Merrill had officially reported to Secretary Bayard, and this man was the leading member of a firm that sought to do its chief business with England, a thoroughly unprincipled opponent of the Provisional Government and of American predominance in the islands. He employed as his active assistant in managing the hotel a highly educated Englishman, of disreputable character, who had written in the Hawaiian British newspaper, under anonymous signature, articles abusive of the United States and grossly falsifying our Government's treatment of the Indians.

"Residing at that hotel, Mr. Blount was under the constant espionage of the palace adventurers. As a precautionary safeguard against thus shutting out the Americans from ready access to Commissioner Blount a wealthy and highly respectable widow lady of the American colony was ready to grant the use of her house to Mr. and Mrs. Blount, the commissioner to pay the same amount it would cost him to live at the royalist hotel. This private house was situated near the United States legation, in the quarter of the city where annexationists and royalists could have unobstructed access to the commissioner and he could conveniently avail himself of the legation records. This polite offer of an American resident to an American commissioner did not originate with the Provisional Government, nor did the Provisional Government have anything whatever to do with the proposed arrangement.

"The effort in his report to cast imputation on the Provisional Government and myself as to the offer of the American house to an American commissioner will be estimated at its true value by the American public. Commissioner Blount's manner toward me in the following weeks I would not allude to here, were it not absolutely necessary to do so. It is well known to all who have knowledge of diplomatic rules and customs that when a new diplomatic agent arrives at the capital to whose Government he is accredited his predecessor and the occupant of the legation should receive him courteously, proffer his services to his successor, inform him of the existing state of affairs, and as soon as convenient give him access to the legation archives. This I did promptly, and had he availed himself of the kind offer of his countrymen as to residence he could have occupied the room at the legation containing the official records, which I was ready to offer him. He coldly repelled my kindly intended offers, did not allow me to show to him the customary forms of introducing him to the foreign diplomatic officials and to the chief public men of Honolulu. How much of his singular course in these regards was due to want of knowledge, and how much to his already matured purpose to make out a case against the United States minister, the naval commander, and the Provisional Government the American public must judge.

SPECIFIC STATEMENTS DENIED.

"All insinuations and implications in Blount's report that I was averse to his access to the legation records is a shameless perversion of facts." Mr. Stevens says he carried necessary documents to Mr. Blount, and adds:

"His manner while allowing me to leave these important documents in his room showed that he cared not to receive them, for the general drift of his report indicates that he did not even read them.

"Ignoring his inferiority of official rank, which, according to established rules the world over, was below that of minister resident, between a consul-general and chargé d'affaires, with the utmost effort of will controlling my outraged sensibilities, while suffering a terrible affliction at the recent sad drowning of a gifted and beloved daughter, I endured this insolent treatment after thirteen years of service as United States minister, without a stain ever before attempted to be made on my official honor or my fidelity to American prestige and to American interests, never during my seventy-three years of life having lifted my voice, my hand, or my rifle against the flag of this American Republic. The charges, implications, and insinuations of Commissioner Blount against President Dole, Minister Thurston, and the other chief men of the Provisional Government are as baseless and unjust as those against myself and Capt. Wiltse, now sleeping in his honored grave.

"Under the date of April 21, he says he disapproved of a request of the Provisional Government that the American forces be landed for drill. I here affirm that the Provisional Government never made such a request.

THE JAPANESE SUFFRAGE.

"What Blount says about the Japanese man-of-war is officially ex parte, absurd, and egotistic. For weeks after his arrival in Honolulu he had not even met or spoken with the Japanese minister." Mr. Stevens then reviews his relations to the Japanese minister regarding the right of suffrage for Japanese residents, and says:

"These friendly interviews, in which the long-existing friendship and mutual interests of our respective countries were fully gone over, gave pacifying results to the well-informed, though they did not at once put an end to public anxiety as to the suffrage agitation and as to what use the fallen Queen's supporters might make of it. Every step of my action was duly reported to the Department of State prior to Blount's having any knowledge on the subject. His claim to have put an end to Hawaiian anxiety about rumored Japanese encroachment is as purely assumptive as his expression to me at my house that to him the Harrison Administration was indebted for the strong Democratic support which was given it in the threatened war with Chile, and that Senator Morgan, now chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, could not aid much in the same direction and is not a level-headed man.

COMMITTEE OF SAFETY.

"In Mr. Blount's report, as given to the press, I find the following language: 'The two leading members of the committee, Messrs. Thurston and Smith, growing uneasy as to the safety of their persons, went to Minister Stevens to know if he would protect them in the event of their arrest by the authorities, to which he gave his assent.' It is enough to say that there is not a semblance of truth in this assertion of Blount, made by him without his ever having hinted it to me or made any inquiry of me on the subject. He thus gives the signature of his indorsement to a charge which I never even heard of until I found it in Blount's printed report.

LANDING THE FORCES.

"He says the response to the call of the committee of safety to land the men of the Boston 'does not appear in the files of the legation.' The meaning of this insinuation is obvious. Enough to say there never was any such document. I received the invitation of the committee of safety for what it was worth, as I received other information on the same subject. I should have requested Capt. Wiltse to have landed his force had not the committee of safety requested it.

"It is well to state here that this landing of American forces in Honolulu had repeatedly taken place in a period running over many years. The elements and forces of Hawaii in play in 1887, 1889, and in 1893, were and are essentially the same, the breadth and strength of the prevailing elements and forces in 1893 being more decisive than in the former periods. Those who assert to the contrary are not honest, else they do not understand what they have written about.

"Blount squarely asserts that I promised to aid the committee of safety by force. This is emphatically and categorically untrue.

"The best answer to the baseless charge that I promised to use force against the Queen is the order of Capt. Wiltse to his officers and men, 'to remain passive,' and that no force was used, though the Queen, through her ministers, strongly requested it hours before the Provisional Government was recognized by me and all the other diplomatic representatives in Honolulu."

Mr. Stevens says that he knew nothing of the import of the meeting of the committee of safety on January 16 at Henry Waterhouse's home, adjoining his own, until he read of it in Blount's report.

KEPT HIMSELF INFORMED.

"It is proper for me to say here," adds Mr. Stevens, "that for three years prior to the Queen's coup d'etat and fall, I had kept myself as thoroughly informed as possible as to the views, plans, and purposes of the several factions and parties that contended for control in Hawaiian political affairs. This necessarily compelled me to hold conversations with the best informed persons of the reform party, the Queen's party, and with the Wilcox and native Hawaiian party, whose organized efforts for months was to induce or compel the Queen to break with her paramour, Marshal Wilson. I was certainly as well informed of the views and plans of the royalists as I was of those of her opponents generally, carefully keeping my private opinion to myself.

LETTER FROM THE QUEEN.

"Regarding the expectations and hopes of the Queen and her representatives in the exciting days from January 14 to January 17, and the views and hopes of her opponents, the following official documents speak for themselves:

"'The assurance conveyed by a royal proclamation by myself and ministers yesterday having been received by my native subjects and ratified at a mass meeting, was received in a different spirit by the meeting representing the foreign population and interests in my Kingdom. It is now my desire to give to your excellency, as the diplomatic representative of the United States of America at my court, the solemn assurance that the present constitution will be upheld and maintained by me and ministers, and no changes will be made except by the method therein provided. I desire to express to your excellency this assurance in the spirit of that friendship which has ever existed between my Kingdom and that of the Government of the United States of America, and which I trust will long continue.

"'Liliuokalani, R.; Samuel Parker, minister of foreign affairs; William H. Cornwell, minister of finance; John F. Colburn, minister of interior; A. P. Peterson, attorney-general. Iolana Palace, Honolulu, January 17, 1893.'

"This earnestly pleading document from the fallen monarch and the terror-stricken lottery gang came to me more than twenty hours after the men of the Boston had landed. This plainly amplified that the fallen Queen and her confidants then knew, as they could not have failed to know, that we had not taken part in her overthrow which had already been accomplished.

"In a report to the Navy Department dated January 16, Capt. Wiltse, after announcing the fact that the forces had been landed, says: 'While there has been no demonstration so far, there can be no doubt that the prompt landing of the battalion has saved life and property.' Mr. Blount's shamefully unfair attempt to cast suspicion on myself in the matter of the hall for the men of the Boston on the first evening of their landing I have answered in my letter to Secretary Gresham."

A CHANGE OF BASE.

Regarding Mr. Blount's change of opinion about Neumann, Mr. Stevens says:

"Why this remarkable change of opinion? So long as he supposed Neumann wished to make a trade with the United States or with the provisional government for a cash consideration of all Liliuokalani claims, Blount regarded Neumann a knave. As soon as this astute commissioner ascertained that Neumann was in full accord with Spreckels and Blount for Liliuokalani's restoration to the throne, Blount immediately learned that Neumann is 'a right-down good fellow.'

"So much for conclusive evidence that Spreckles, Neumann, and Blount were then, as now, rowing the same boat and closely linked in the conspiracy to damage the action of Harrison's Administration and of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs on the question of annexation. This tilt of Blount, Spreckels, and Neumann against Marcy, Grant, Seward, Fish, Blaine, Harrison, and other leading American statesmen must amuse the American public as much as other recent transactions hostile to the American colony in Hawaii are exciting just public indignation.

MAKERS OF AFFIDAVITS.

"So far as the affidavits of John F. Colburn, A. P. Peterson, and Charles L. Hopkins, and the letter of Cornwell conflict with any writing or act of mine, I will not multiply words. The first named is a notorious corruption-ist, with some amiable qualities, who aided in bribing the legislative members to vote out the Jones-Wilcox ministry and to pass the lottery bill. Peterson is the man who aided in the distribution of the lottery stock for the purchase of legislative vote, and held the Queen's authority to constitute a lottery cabinet, and to aid the Queen to proclaim a reactionary constitution.

"As to Samuel Parker, whose testimony is used to discredit my action, I would gladly say little. Mostly of native Hawaiian stock, he has a small fraction of Anglo-Saxon blood. His word and his note are of little value among the bankers and business men of Honolulu. For years trying to play politics and to be the Queen's minister, for which service he is without capacity, he has competed with Wilson for the control and the favors of the recent immoral occupant of the palace."

Dr. Tronse, J. A. Cummins Hopkins, and W. T. Seward are also sharply criticised, and Mr. Stevens continues thus:

"Regarding the Gov. Cleghorn, whose protest Blount speaks of relative to landing the men of the Boston, little need be said. Under the monarchy, prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1887, the Hawaiian governor had some importance. The office was abolished by that constitution. The legislature of 1890 restored the office as an honorary title, giving little power of duty. Cleghorn is a brother-in-law to the fallen Liliuokalani; is the reputed father of the so-called princess now residing in England, whose half sister is married to the English minister's son. Cleghorn is completely under the influence and follows the advice of English Minister Wodehouse. His protest came to me after the landing of the Boston's marines. Prior to Cornwell's two expulsions, Neumann had been voted out August 20, 1892, by a vote of 31 to 10. Reappointed by the Queen, September 12, he was voted out October 17, by 31 to 15. He was a close confederate with Peterson and Cornwell. He was known to be of the contract-labor ring which was bleeding the planters. With good reasons he was believed to be the author of the Queen's revolutionary and despotic new constitution. He is the man whom the Queen sent to Washington to get her restored to the throne or to sell her claim to the crown in cash. What a remarkable trio, Spreckels, Neumann, and Blount, two honest German Jews, and the astute, impartial, unprejudiced new-born diplomatist who had represented that he was the Democratic leader who had led his party to support Harrison in the threatened Chilean war, while he severely denounced Admiral Brown and Minister Egan. Spreckels, Neumann, and Blount, who will decipher the enigma, explain the philosophy, and state the substantial considerations which bind this trio together?

"The testimony of hundreds of such would not counterbalance the words of Minister Thurston, President Dole, and Henry Waterhouse among honest men who knew the respective parties. As to Wilson, the Queen's immoral favorite for many years, whom Blount attempts to whitewash, I will not soil these pages by giving even the notorious facts in his regard. As to my recognition of the Provisional Government, I reaffirm what I said in my recent letter to Secretary Gresham.

"Queen Liliuokalani inaugurated the revolution by attempting to destroy the constitution by revolutionary means. From Saturday afternoon, January 14, to January 16, there was no government in Honolulu except in the united and self-possessed attitude of the citizens, who assembled in a great mass-meeting on January 16 and consummated their efforts for law and order by the establishment of the Provisional Government on the 17th, which was promptly acknowledged by all the foreign representatives who were familiar with the circumstances of its creation. It was nearly fifty hours after Liliuokalani and her favorites had destroyed her throne by a revolutionary outbreak when the men of the Boston landed. In the exciting hours preceding and following her fall her representatives, as well as those who formed the Provisional Government, had equal access to the legation. To all proper inquiries my answer was that the United States marines could not take sides, but whatever de facto government might exist would have to be recognized. When I did recognize it, late in the afternoon of the 17th, the Provisional Government was complete master of the situation, had full control of the city and of the Government archives, the police station being surrounded and at the mercy of the Provisional Government.

"Against all just expectations I have been forced to expose the anomalous, the un-American, and most unfair course of Blount and associates against my official conduct, my honor, and all that a public man holds dear. This extraordinary assault on the American colony in Hawaii, antagonizing the American Christian civilization there established at the cost of the lives and labors of noble American men and women; this strange turning back on an American policy of more than half a century; this wanton disregard of the opportunity to assume jurisdiction and ownership of a territorial and maritime prize with a clean title and without the cost of a single life is justly causing profound indignation among the American people. These strange and unpatriotic proceedings in the presence of our national rivals is making a most shameful page of American history, which our future, if not our present, statesmen and generation will repudiate and blot out by wise and effective measures."

I submit a statement made by Mr. Thurston concerning Mr. Blount's report:

MR. BLOUNT ANSWERED—MINISTER THURSTON DISSECTS THE COMMISSIONER'S REPORT—MANY VERY GROSS INACURACIES—IT IS SHOWN THAT THE UNITED STATES FORCES DID NOT LAND UNTIL NEARLY FORTY-EIGHT HOURS AFTER THE REVOLUTION HAD COMMENCED, AND THEIR INSTRUCTIONS WERE TO REMAIN PASSIVE—NO SECRECY ABOUT THE MOVEMENT TO OVERTHROW THE QUEEN.

Mr. Thurston, the Hawaiian minister, is no longer silent. He gave to the press last night a statement which dissects Commissioner Blount's report and shows upon how flimsy a foundation that famous document rests. Mr. Thurston hesitated some time before preparing his statement, but finally concluded that the statements of Mr. Blount ought not to remain unanswered. In his statement Mr. Thurston says:

MINISTER THURSTON'S STATEMENT.

As I have received no official information that Mr. Blount has made a report; have not seen a copy of it and do not know what it contains, except from reading newspaper abstracts therefrom, and am unaware of the present contentions of the United States Government concerning Hawaii, I am unable at present, in the absence of such knowledge, to intelligently state what the position and claims of the Hawaiian Government are. It would, moreover, be contrary to diplomatic courtesy for me to publish a statement on such subject prior to informing the United States Government of the same.

A large portion of the published extracts from Mr. Blount's report consist, however, of personal attacks upon me and those associated with me in the Provisional Government, impugning our veracity, good faith, and courage, and charging us with fraud and duplicity. I deem it proper, therefore, to make a personal reply to such charges, confining myself to statements of fact, which, as a principal actor, I am prepared to testify to before any impartial tribunal.

First. Before stating such facts, I desire to call attention to Mr. Blount's method of constructing his report. Although he in several places states that I was the leader of the revolutionary movement, he has never asked me a question concerning the same, nor given me opportunity to make any statement, although I have at all times been ready and willing to do so. The same is true of a large number of other men who took a leading part in the movement of January last.

In the second place, his evidence consists exclusively of prepared affidavits or answers to leading questions put by himself, at private interviews, no one else being present but the stenographer. In no instance has there been any cross-examination of witnesses, opportunity given to contradict or explain evidence given, or present other evidence.

NUMEROUS INCORRECT STATEMENTS.

A brief examination of the published portions of the report shows numerous incorrect statements. I shall endeavor for the present, however, to answer the more salient points only.

First. Mr. Blount charges that the American troops were landed under a prearranged agreement with the committee of safety that they should so land and assist in the overthrow of the Queen. In reply thereto, I hereby state that at no time did Mr. Stevens or Capt. Wiltse assure me or the committee of safety, or any subcommittee thereof, that the United States troops would assist in overthrowing the Queen or establishing the provisional government, and as a matter of fact they did not so assist.

I can produce witnesses in support of this statement, of the highest responsibility, in overwhelming numbers; but Mr. Blount has rendered it unnecessary to do so. The statements of Mr. Wurdenberg and Mr. Damon have been put forward as the strongest evidence in support of Mr. Blount's contention. In Mr. Wurdenberg's statement he says that when the committee of safety told Mr. Stevens they were not ready to act, he replied: "Gentlemen, the troops of the Boston will land ot 5 o'clock, whether you are ready or not." The reason for this reply and the subsequent landing of the troops is manifest. The troops were landed to protect American citizens and property in the event of the impending and inevitable conflict between the Queen and the citizens, and not to coöperate with the committee in carrying out its plans. In fact, the troops did not coöperate with the committee, and the committee had no more knowledge than the Queen's Government where the troops were going, nor what they were going to do. The whole gist of Mr. Damon's long examination is likewise contained in his statement that when, after the organization and proclamation of the new Government, a request was made for the support of the United States troops, it was refused, Lieut. Commander Swinburne, the commanding officer, sending back word, "Capt. Wiltse's orders are, 'Remain passive.'"

THE TROOPS DID NOT ASSIST.

Second. Mr. Blount charges that the Queen had ample military force with which to have met the committee, and that but for the support of the United States representatives and troops the establishment of the provisional government would have been impossible.

In reply thereto I hereby state that although the presence of the American troops had a quieting effect on the rough characters in the city, and may have prevented some bloodshed, they were not essential to and did not assist in the overthrow of the Queen. The result of the movement would have been eventually the same if there had not been a marine within a thousand miles of Honolulu.

In support of this statement I cite the following facts;

1. The troops did not land till Monday night, the 16th of January, after the revolution had been in full progress since the afternoon of Saturday, the 14th, during which time the committee of safety was openly organizing for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the Queen.

2. There was absolutely no attempt at concealment from the Government of the objects and intentions of the committee.

3. The Queen, her cabinet, and their supporters were utterly demoralized, suspicious of one another, and devoid of leadership.

4. The committee of safety and their supporters were united; had ample force to execute their purpose; knew precisely what they wanted, and proceeded with intelligent deliberation, thoroughness and confidence to do it.

There is no conflict concerning the facts of the first proposition. It is admitted by all that the Queen began the revolution at noon on Saturday, the 14th, by attempting to promulgate a constitution; that such attempt was immediately followed by preparation on the part of the citizens for armed resistance, and that the United States troops landed at 5 o'clock Monday, the 16th.

THE REVOLUTION NOT SECRET.

In support of the second proposition, that there was no concealment from the Government of the intentions of the committee, I submit the following:

1. On the afternoon of Saturday, the 14th, in reply to the request of the Queen's cabinet for advice as to what they had better do, the Queen then still insisting upon the promulgation of the constitution and supporting it by force, I advised them to declare the Queen in revolution and the throne vacant, and at their request and with the express approval of two of them and the tacit assent of the other two, then and there drew up a form of proclamation to that effect.

2. At half past 4 on the afternoon of Saturday, the 14th, at a meeting of about two hundred citizens at the office of W. O. Smith, the Queen was denounced in the strongest terms; armed resistance and a counter revolution was openly advocated, and the Queen's minister of the interior, John Colburn, addressed the meeting, asking their armed support against the Queen. The Queen's attorney-general, Mr. Peterson, and her attorney, Paul Neuman, were both present, taking part in the meeting. The committee of safety was publicly then and there named and proceeded forthwith to organize.

At 6 o'clock on Sunday morning, the 15th, I told Mr. Peterson and Mr. Colburn, two members of the Queen's cabinet, that the committee intended to depose the Queen and establish a provisional government; that if they would take charge of the movement, well and good, otherwise the committee intended to take action on its own account. They asked for twenty-four hours in which to consider the matter. I declined to wait, stating to them that the committee intended to proceed forthwith.

4. The committee met openly that morning at 10 o'clock, with the full knowlege of the Government of the place of its meeting. It remained in session during the greater part of the day, while several police kept watch of the building from the street.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

On Monday morning at 9 o'clock the committee, without attempt at concealment, met in my office, within 200 feet of the police station, Marshal Wilson's headquarters, where the entire police force was stationed. While the meeting was in progress Wilson came to the office and asked to speak to me privately, and we went into an adjoining room. Our conversation was in substance as follows:

Wilson said, "I want this meeting stopped," referring to the mass-meeting for that afternoon.

I replied, "It can not be stopped. It is too late."

He said, "Can not this thing be fixed up in some way?"

I replied, "No it can not. It has gone too far."

He said, "The Queen has abandoned her new constitution idea."

I replied, "How do we know that she will not take it up again as she said she would?"

He said, "I will guarantee that she will not, even if I have to lock her up in a room to keep her from doing it, and I'll do it, too, if necessary."

I replied, "We are not willing to accept that guarantee as sufficient. This thing has gone on from bad to worse until we are not going to stand it any longer. We are going to take no chances in the matter, but settle it now, once and for all."

Wilson then left the office. He has since stated that he immediately reported to the cabinet and advised arresting the committee, but the cabinet were afraid and refused to allow it.

At 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Monday, the 16th, a meeting of 3,000 unarmed men was held within a block of the palace. The meeting was addressed by a number of speakers, all denouncing the Queen. The meeting with tremendous cheering and enthusiasm, unanimously adopted resolutions declaring the Queen to be in revolution and authorizing the committee to proceed to do whatever was necessary. The police was present, but no attempt was made to interfere with the meeting or make any arrests. The meeting adjourned amid the most intense excitement, and the citizens dispersed throughout the town, awaiting the further call of the committee.

While the meeting was in progress another meeting was being held by the royalists in the street, within a block of the armory, which adopted resolutions in support of the Queen.

MR. BLOUNT GROSSLY INACCURATE.

Never in the history of Hawaii has there been such a tense condition of mind, or a more imminent expectation of bloodshed and conflict than there was immediately after the adjournment of those two radically opposed meetings. Mr. Blount's statement that the community was at peace and quiet was grossly inaccurate.

It was at this juncture, two hours after the adjournment of the above meeting, that Capt. Wiltse and Mr. Stevens, acting upon their own responsibilities and discretion and irrespective of the request or actions of the committee, landed the troops, which were distributed in three parts of the city, instead of being massed at one point as stated by Mr. Blount. The reason that the Queen's Government took no action against the committee or its supporters was that they were overwhelmed by the unanimous display of indignation and determination shown by the citizens, and were cowed into submission in the same manner that the King and his supporters were cowed under precisely similar circumstances by the same citizens in June, 1887.

THE QUEEN'S SUPPORTERS DEMORALIZED.

In support of the third proposition, that the Queen and her supporters were demoralized and devoid of leadership, I submit the following:

1. During the few weeks prior to the revolution, Mr. Colburn, minister of the interior at the time of the revolution, had been one of the leaders of the political party opposed to myself, and openly and bitterly hostile to me personally. My first intimation of the revolutionary intention of the Queen was at 10 o'clock on the morning of Saturday, the 14th, when Mr. Colburn came to me greatly excited. He told me of the Queen's intentions to promulgate a new constitution, and asked my advice. I said to him, "Why do you not go to the members of your own party?" He replied, "I have no party. Those who have been our supporters are supporting the Queen. The downtown people (referring to the merchants) have got no use for me, and unless the members of your party and other citizens will support us we are going to resign right away."

2. At 1 o'clock on the same day I met all the members of the cabinet at the attorney-general's office. They had just come from an interview with the Queen, at which she had announced her intention of promulgating a constitution, and demanded their support. They stated that she had threatened them with mob violence, whereupon they had immediately left the palace, each one going out by a separate entrance. While we were talking a messenger came from the Queen requesting them to immediately return to the palace. Peterson and Colburn positively refused to do so, stating that they did not consider their lives would be safe there. I shortly after left them and started down town. After I had gone about two blocks I was overtaken by a messenger from the cabinet asking me to return, which I did. They asked me to ascertain what support they could expect from citizens, and formally authorized me to formally state the condition of affairs to leading citizens, and in their behalf to call for armed volunteers to resist the Queen. I immediately proceeded to comply with their request, and with the assistance of others within an hour or two thereafter about eighty leading citizens had signed a written statement agreeing to support the cabinet against the Queen by force.

STORMY INTERVIEW WITH THE QUEEN.

3. Later the same afternoon Mr. Colburn informed me that he had finally gone to the palace and held a stormy interview with the Queen, lasting for over two hours. He told me that he had no confidence in his colleague, Mr. Peterson whom he believed was playing double with him, and told me to beware of telling Peterson anything further. As a reason for his distrust he said that he knew nothing of the intention to promulgate a constitution, but that while they were discussing the matter with the Queen she said, in reply to an objection made by Peterson, "Why did you not make this objection before; you have had this constitution in your possession for a month and raised no objection to it."

Colburn said also that in reply to an objection made by Mr. Parker, minister of foreign affairs, she said, "Why did you not tell me this last night when we were talking over the subject?"

Colburn further stated to me that at a caucus of their party on the previous Friday night, one of the members of the Legislature, Kaluna by name, had said that if he colud establish the new constitution he would die happy, if he could kill some other men before dying.

4. The Queen was furiously angry at the refusal of the cabinet to join her in promulgating the constitution, and publicly denounced them therefor.

ROYALISTS WANTED TO SHED BLOOD.

5. When the Queen made announcement of her failure to promulgate the constitution, two of the leading Royalists, members of the Legislature, one in the throne room of the palace, and one upon the steps of the building, addressed the assembled crowd, denounced the cabinet as traitors, and said that they wanted to shed blood. One of them included the Queen in his denunciations.

6. During the entire time between noon of Saturday, the 14th, and the afternoon of Tuesday, the 17th, when the provisional government was proclaimed, the Queen's cabinet was without plan of action, and did practically nothing, but rush about the city consulting with various foreign representatives, and citizens of all parties, as to what they had better do, begging the American minister for the support of the American troops against the committee of safety, and securing from the Queen a declaration that she would not again attempt to abrogate the constitution, which they hurried into print and distributed broadcast to try and appease the indignation of citizens and break up the proposed mass-meeting.

THE COMMITTEE OF SAFETY WERE UNITED.

In support of the fourth proposition, that the committee and their supporters were united, had ample force to execute their purpose, and proceed with deliberation and confidence to do so, I submit the following: An essential factor in judging whether the force of the committee was sufficient, and their confidence in themselves well founded, is to know what the same men under similar conditions have done upon previous occasions. Fortunately there is no dispute as to the facts concerning two recent incidents in Hawaiian history, in which the same parties who were brought into conflict in January, 1893, were arrayed against each other under similar circumstances.

1. In 1887 the King, by a manipulation of the electorate and the legislature, had encroached upon popular rights and obtained autocratic power over the people. In this course he was supported by practically the same persons who in January last, and now, constitute the Royalist party in Hawaii. The open bribery, corruption, and debauchery of the King and his supporters crystallized the opposition thereto into an organization of practically the same men who organized and now constitute the provisional government. Such organization was formed with the openly avowed intention of wresting from the King his powers or dethroning him. In preparation of the expected movement, the King fortified the palace; loopholed its basement for sharpshooters; erected sand-bag breastworks at the entrance of the building; mounted cannon and Gatling guns at all the approaches thereto; largely increased his regular military force, and defied the organization and public opinion.

The leaders of the revolutionary movement proceeded deliberately to collect such arms as were available and organized their plans. An executive committee of thirteen was appointed, who took entire control of the movement and called a mass meeting in the same building used for that purpose in January last.

The King attempted to head off the meeting by sending a letter to it promising certain reforms. The letter had no effect. Resolutions were adopted denouncing the King and demanding the granting of a new constitution depriving the King of all personal power. The resolutions were forthwith presented to the King by the committee, who unarmed and alone proceeded direct from the meeting to the fortified palace, with the ultimatum that he comply with the demands within twenty-four hours or take the consequences.

HOW THE KING SURRENDERED.

The King was then in absolute control of the regular troops, the special troops enlisted for the occasion, four companies of native militia, the police, all the artillery and Gatling guns, the government buildings, the palace, the barracks, and the station house, with full knowledge of and weeks of preparation for the action taken by the citizens. His military strength was greater and his control of the public buildings more complete than was that of the Queen in January last.

He did not fire a shot, submitted to all demands, disbanded his troops, and turned the whole control of the government over to the revolutionary party, who, in consideration of his abject submission, allowed him to continue on the throne in a figurehead capacity.

2. In 1889, while the same men who now constitute the provisional government were in control of the King's government, a conspiracy was organized among the royalist supporters by the King and Liliuokalani, for the overthrow of the cabinet and the restoration of the old royal power and constitution.

The conspirators took the cabinet by surprise, and on the night of July 29 took possession of the Government buildings and palace, and, securing possession of all the artillery, fortified the latter.

VICTORY OVER ROYAL POWER.

The regular troops, by order of the King, refused to assist the cabinet, who called upon the white militia and white citizens for assistance. The call was promptly responded to. The revolutionists were protected by an 8-foot stone wall around the palace, and used artillery as well as rifles, while the cabinet supporters were armed with rifles alone. The fighting opened at 9 o'clock in the morning with less than thirty cabinet supporters in position in front of the palace, which number was later increased to about five hundred. The royalist revolutionists opened with a furious fire of both artillery and small arms. Within half an hour they were driven from their guns, seven were killed, and twelve wounded, and before dark all of them were dispersed or captured, while not one of the cabinet supporters was injured.

Such is the undisputed record of events upon two occasions when the royalists and the organizers of the Provisional Government have come into armed conflict, when there has been no suggestion of support to either side by any outside power.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT NOT COWARDLY.

Under these circumstances I submit that the burden of proof is upon those who claim that the leaders of the Provisional Government are cowards, or that they are incompetent to organize or successfully carry out a revolution against the royalists in Hawaii.

It is unnecessary for me to here restate the details of the bitter constitutional conflict which had been carried on between the Queen and the Legislature during the seven months prior to January last, nor to speak of the intense indignation existing among all classes of citizens by reason of the open and successful alliance of the Queen with the opium and lottery rings. The political liberties of the people had been trampled upon and their moral sense shocked. It simply needed the added provocation of the arbitrary attempt to abrogate the constitution and disfranchise every white man in the country to spontaneously crystallize opposition into a force that was irresistible.

THEY WERE NOT ALIENS.

In reply to the sneer that the persons taking part in the movement were "aliens," I would say that every man of them was by the laws of the country a legal voter, whose right to the franchise was by the proposed constitution to be abrogated. A large proportion of them were born in the country, and almost without exception those who were not born there had lived there for years, owned property there, and had made it their home. They were the men who had built up the country commercially, agriculturally, financially, and politically, and created and made possible a civilized government therein. They were and are such men as to-day are the leading citizens of the most progressive communities of the United States, with interests as thoroughly identified with the interests of Hawaii as are the interests of native and foreign-born citizens in similar communities in this country identified with it.

Upon these statements, coming from reliable sources, I submit that the statement of the President as to the manner in which the monarchy was overthrown and the Provisional Government was established is shown to be incorrect.

I also submit as part of my remarks a quotation from an interview which I suppose to be correct, at least I have never seen it denied, of one among the ablest and best-informed men in this country upon international law, Hon. John A. Kasson. His personal relations to Secretary Gresham are friendly, and there appears to be no reason why he should not take an unprejudiced and impartial view of Hawaiian affairs. In the Washington Post of November 14 appears a report of the interview, which is as follows:

I can not accept the hypothesis of the press as correct that the President has ordered armed intervention to restore the deposed monarchy to the Hawaiian throne. I can not believe it to be true. Such an act would be worse than a declaration of war. It would be an act of piracy.

In the first place, Secretary Gresham's letter to the President contains charges of hypocrisy, deceit, and wrongdoing against not merely the preceding Administration, but against the American Government as represented by that Administration. In international matters it is an unwritten law, and is in line with the usage of nations, that there are no parties. No foreign government ever condemns in such manner the international acts and policy of its preceding administration, for in so doing it is attacking its own government. The Secretary's letter at least should have been kept from publication.

But to refer to the hypothesis that the President has ordered armed intervention; there are several plain reasons why I am compelled to regard it as untenable. First, it would be doing exactly what Secretary Gresham's letter accuses the previous Administration of doing, namely, interfering by force to overthrow a friendly government. It is den ed by President Harrison, Minister Stevens, and others in position to know that the Queen was deposed by American intervention; but admitting for the contention that force was used to overawe her supporters by the presence of the American marines, it is clear beyond question that the President would be doing the very thing his Secretary condemns so strongly in the preceding Administration.

Secondly, the hypothesis supposes that the President without the authority of Congress would declare war against a friendly power and in a manner which would violate every principle of international usage. It is a declaration of international law, only violated by savages or in dealing with barbarians, that a declaration of war must precede the overt act of hostility, that it must be made to the representative of the power to be attacked at the capital of the attacking nation, and that he be given time to settle his affairs and turn over the interests of his legation and the citizens of his country to the representative of some friendly government, as was done by the German minister at Paris on the declaration of war, when German interests were confided to the American minister. No such declaration has been made. The accredited and accepted representative of the Hawaiian Government has received no notice of this rumored act of hostility in time to inform his government. In fact, the whole theory presupposes a most violent and unprecedented act of aggression.

It should be borne in mind that whatever may have been the means adopted to remove the Queen from the throne, the international status of the provisional government is established beyond question. It has received the recognition not only of the foreign governments, but its representatives have been received by us and ours by it. It has all the rights of the most powerful government on the face of the earth. If there should be an attempt to land the armed forces of the United States at Honolulu it would not only be the right but the duty of the provisional government to draw up its forces at the landing place and attempt to arrest, seize, and hold them. It would be the unquestioned right of the provisional government to seize the person of the Queen as an ally of the United States, hold her as a hostage against aggression, and, if they deemed it necessary, to put her to death.

I am not prepared to believe that the President would either declare war without the consent of Congress in violation of the Constitution, or commit such an act of piracy as attacking and endeavoring to overturn a friendly power without due and formal notice to its representatives.

I also submit as part of my remarks an article published in the New York Independent. The New York Independent is a fair representative of the Christian press of this country:

A VERY PECULIAR EXHIBITION.

Let us see what the condition of things is. A queen was reigning who had attempted by absolute fiat to disfranchise the white citizens of the islands; the government was totally corrupt, hand in glove with the lottery. The white people of the islands, with the more intelligent part of the natives, including all the leading native ministers but one, were totally dissatisfied, and felt that her reign was a constant menace to their safety and prosperity. Her deposition was a righteous act, just as righteous as that which deposed Charles I; and there was far more occasion for it than for the rebellion of our ancestors against George III. By an uprising of the people who had been threatened and injured, and who felt that their property and lives were in danger, she was removed from the throne, and it was right that the representatives of the American Government should be ready to recognize the change.

A republican form of government was declared, and men were sent to this country to offer the islands to be annexed to the United States. There can be no sort of question on anybody's part that annexation would be better for the United States and better for the islands. They properly belong to us and have got to be, anyhow, under our protection. The only question is, if they are not annexed, whether they shall be protected as a republic or protected as a monarchy. Our Administration declares for the monarchy, and proposes to put back upon the throne a discredited queen, although her restoration can be effected only by a succession of bloody disturbances which will endanger the life and property of American citizens as well as of the people of Hawaii. It is a very peculiar exhibition, that of the United States restoring a monarchy against the will of the people.

In Hawaii the native race has less enterprise than the negroes, and the people care very little who rules them. Their interests are slight in either case. There is in Hawaii no system of suppressing the native vote, and yet we presume that on a fair vote at the present time the Provisional Government would be supported; at any rate, it is the only Government in existence, and President Cleveland takes a very serious responsibility if he undertakes to overthrow it. To give by force the American interests and citizens of American birth in Hawaii to Claus Spreckels and the lottery and opium gangs would be infamous.

One word as to Secretary Gresham's sneer at the revolutionists as aliens. He says that "a majority of the thirteen members of the provisional committee, including five Americans, were aliens," and that "a citizen of the United States" read the proclamation deposing the Queen. Every one of these men was a voting citizen of Hawaii. We quote from the Hawiian constitution:

"Every male resident of the Hawaiian Islands of Hawaiian, American, or European birth or descent, who shall have attained the age of 20 years, shall be entitled to vote at any election, provided that he shall have resided in the country not less than one year preceding such election; that he shall be able to read and comprehend an ordinary newspaper printed in either the Hawaiian or some European language, and that he shall have taken the oath to support the constitution of 1887."

The foreign element thus enfranchised conducts all the business and industrial enterprises, pays four-fifths of the taxes, and is most deeply concerned in good government.

If a Senatorial commission is sent to Hawaii, it will learn much more than Mr. Blount has told Secretary Gresham.

In this connection I submit what purports to be an interview with Bishop Newman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, an eminent divine, who visited the Sandwich Islands and undoubtedly speaks advisedly, as he always does upon any subject which he investigates:

BISHOP NEWMAN'S PLAIN WORDS CRITICISING THE COURSE OF THE ADMINISTRATION IN THE HAWAIIAN AFFAIR.

A special dispatch from Omaha to the New York Tribune quotes Bishop John P. Newman as follows in an interview upon the Hawaiian question:

"There is one point I wish to state first and emphasize. The revolutionists were natives, were subjects of the Government they overthrew. I am familiar with the islands and their people, and I have other information on this subject. They were not foreigners, and had as much right to revolutionize the Government as had our forefathers. The men who formed the Provisional Government were for the most part the native-born sons of missionaries and merchants who went to the islands long ago. The United States had nothing to do with deposing Queen Liliuokalani. The marines landed from the Boston, according to Minister Stevens and all the evidence, did not take any part in the revolution; they simply protected American property. The point is, what right has this Government to interfere now, and say that the Government which the people of the country overthrew shall be restored? When I was there during the old King's time the people were already talking of revolution—and it was their, not our, revolution."

"What will be the effect of the position taken by this Government?"

"President Cleveland is my President, that is, he is the President of my country, and I would not like to say anything harsh or unguarded, but for the honor of the country I hope that one Administration will not, out of pique, go back on another Administration. I think that the publication of Secretary Gresham's letter was premature, and I will also say that I think there is some personal feeling on his part in the matter toward the last Administration. The giving out of his letter and the position taken in it is certainly a remarkable proceeding. The letter should have been transmitted through the President to the next Congress. An important point is that the Government has recognized the Provisional Government, and Minister Willis has been accredited to it. How then can the President, acting alone, without Congress, withdraw our representative to the Provisional Government and send one to the Queen? The Government would have to reverse itself to do so, and the question comes up as to the right of the President to act without the consent of the Senate.

"But the present Administration's recognizing the Queen and restoring her to the throne are two very different things. The adherents of the Queen will not be able to restore her to the throne without aid, and whether President Cleveland will send warships and enough soldiers to restore the old government, which would be a most remarkable proceeding on the part of this Republic, I can not say. From my knowledge of the people there, whom I well know, the Provisional Government can not be permanently overthrown."

Bishop Newman believes that Hawaii should belong to the United States, and that the islands will in a short time be peopled and controlled entirely by the Saxon race. The native race is dying off, and the country must, in the course of time, be under the protection of and belong either to the United States or some European government. He is therefore heartily in favor of annexation, and believes that the sooner it is accomplished the better it will be for both countries.

I also submit in the same connection a cablegram from London:

ASTONISHED AT OUR HAWAIIAN POLICY.

LONDON, November 13.

The Daily News says editorially of Secretary Gresham's report on Hawaii: "It is astonishing what self-control the American Government shows in refusing to annex Hawaii, which could be had for the asking and would supply a want of America's growing commerce. Mr. Harrison did his best to pledge his successor to annexation, but vainly. It is an example to all of us, and especially to the warriors in Matabelaland, who announce light-heartedly that they have gone there to slay."

I submit another extract, "Spreckels feels very good." I think that should go in connection with the other quotations, as Mr. Spreckels appears to be unusually pleased with the policy of the Administration:

SPRECKELS FEELS VERY GOOD—CONFIDENT THE QUEEN WILL BE RETURNED TO POWER WITHOUT BLOODSHED.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 12.

In an interview to-day Claus Spreckels, in regard to Secretary Gresham's letter to the President, expressed his satisfaction over the news.

"Do you anticipate any serious trouble when an attempt to return the Queen to power is made?" he was asked.

"No. There have been threats made that the Queen would never live to rule Hawaii again, but I have regarded them as foolish utterances. If ever the Queen should be harmed there would be terrible times in Hawaii. The natives are a peaceable lot of people as a rule and love the Queen. I think that the restoration of the Queen to power will be accomplished without any opposition demonstration."

I also submit in this connection an article published in the Manufacturer, entitled "The Hawaiian business:"

THE HAWAIIAN BUSINESS.

The ground of Mr. Cleveland's extraordinary action with respect to Hawaii is the assertion made by Secretary Gresham, upon Commissioner Blount's authority, that the Government of the Queen was overthrown by the act of the American minister, backed by United States troops. This theory having been adopted, Mr. Cleveland has assumed it to be his duty to restore the Government thus wrongfully deposed by an act of unwarrantable interference upon our part. Ex-Minister Stevens, however, has publicly declared that the Gresham-Blount theory is without foundation in fact. He has asserted that the Queen was dethroned by the revolutionists without help from him, and that the new Government had been set up and put into successful operation before the American troops were landed. Here is a question of veracity between Blount, who obtained his alleged information at second hand, and Stevens, who was upon the spot when the revolution was effected. It should be fully understood, in estimating the value of the evidence offered, that Mr. Stevens is a man of the highest character, against whom no word of reproach has been uttered, and whose declarations upon any subject would be received without question by anyone who knows him.

It is plainly apparent that the American people believe him as he was believed by President Harrison and Secretary Foster. The judgment of the nation upon the case is that the revolutionists did a most praiseworthy act in dethroning a worthless woman and in organizing a republic upon a basis of the intelligence and wealth of the islands. Public opinion here commends the wisdom with which the men in charge of the new Government have conducted its affairs under trying circumstances, and the success achieved by them in maintaining the public credit. The American people strongly incline to believe that Cleveland and Gresham were animated, from the very first, by a purpose to discredit President Harrison and his Administration, and that they have been busy during all these months of delay trying to manufacture evidence which would appear to justify their predetermined purpose to undo the good work that had been done.

Mr. Cleveland's method of procedure in this matter indicates that he feared the indignation of the American people. He has suppressed Blount's report; he did not venture to address Congress upon the subject of his purpose to restore the monarchy; he held back Gresham's letter until after the elections, knowing well what answer the country would give to that mendacious utterance; and he forbade the recently naturalized Englishman whom he has sent to Hawaii to disclose his mission until the sailing of the first steamer after his arrival. If the business were honest and defensible there would be no need to resort to these sneaking and shady practices. Mr. Cleveland knows that it is neither honest nor defensible. Even the Philadelphia Ledger, which has jeoparded its own popularity by eulogizing actions which the public attributed either to a want of patriotism or a want of sense, can not commend this grave misconduct.

The President is well aware that he has no more authority to overturn the Government of Hawaii and to put a dusky wanton on the throne than he has to declare war against England. He ought to be impeached and expelled in disgrace from the White House if he shall make such an attempt. He has been encouraged by the approval given by foolish journals to his unlawful efforts to bully and control Congress to imagine that he can do as he pleases; but he has gone too far. The American people have endured much insolence from him, but the spectacle of one of their Presidents defying the laws of his own country for the purpose of destroying the Government of another country will not be patiently observed.

There is a certain grim humor in the suggestion made by the Administration that the revolution in Hawaii deserves no respect, because the Provisional Government did not submit the matter to a vote of the natives. This was particularly complained of by Mr. Commissioner Blount, who found his way into Congress by suppression of the colored vote in his district in Georgia. It filled with grief and indignation the mind of Mr. Cleveland, who holds his office because the colored people of the solid South were forcibly disfranchised. This yearning desire for the free expression of opinion from the heathen of Hawaii by men who have connived at and profited by the refusal to permit great bodies of American citizens to give expression to their opinions is almost too ridiculous for serious consideration.

No Southern man can devise an argument for justification of the treatment accorded to the black people, which will not have far more force for the justification of the action of the native and other white men who have rescued the Government of Hawaii from the opera bouffe queen who controlled it. The hope of patriotic Americans is that the members of the Provisional Government, if overthrown by Mr. Cleveland's orders, will again seize the power when the American troops shall be withdrawn. It is also hoped they will fully understand that the sentiment of this nation was represented by President Harrison, not by the incubus now occupying the White House, and that if Hawaii will simply wait the people here will see to it that the next administration will be of a kind that will treat Mr. Cleveland's policy with the contempt it deserves.

I also submit articles, published in the New York Press of November 11, the Evening Star of the same date, and the Washington Post of the same date, and with these I will conclude.

[New York Press, November 11.]

COWARDICE AND TREASON.

It is with a deep sense of shame that the Press presents this morning the proposition of an American Secretary of State, holding the office once honored by Seward, Fish, and Blaine, to restore the monarchical government in Hawaii. For the first time in American history it is proposed to use the power of the United States to reëstablish a throne, and to impose upon a free people the degradation of monarchical rule, from which, by an uprising wisely planned and bloodlessly accomplished, they had been self-liberated. The pretense for this crowning infamy of the Cleveland Administration is that the United States gave sympathy and influence, through the American minister in Hawaii and the naval forces stationed there, to the cause of the revolution.

We are proud to be able to say that up to the time that Grover Cleveland, with Walter Q. Gresham as his chief adviser, took control of the National Administration, the sympathy and influence of the American Republic has always been given to the cause of free government in other nationalities. Americans aided the colonists of South America in their struggle for liberation from the Spanish yoke, but no American Secretary of State therefore proposed that American power should be used to restore the dominion of Spain over revolted Venezuela and Peru. Americans aided Texas in the heroic and successful effort of that people to cast off the dominion of Mexico. Indeed, the case of Texas is, in some respects, similar to that of Hawaii, for it was aliens, chiefly of American birth, as Gresham would have called them, who fell at the Alamo and who won the memorable battle of San Jacinto. But for "American aliens" the Texas war for independence would not have resulted in a glorious triumph, and the great State of the Southwest would never have added its Lone Star to the American galaxy.

Yet who, even among the most earnest opponents of Texas annexation, ever dreamed of suggesting that Texas should be given back to her tyrants because she owed her liberation from those tyrants to aliens of American birth? Had such an infamous suggestion been made to Andrew Jackson, how he would have crushed the craven proposal with patriotic fury!

But for Americans and American influence Mexico itself would have remained under the heel of the tyrant Maximilian, who was driven, chiefly through the patriotic policy of a Secretary of State far different from Gresham from the throne which he had usurped, and who met at the hands of Mexicans the fate which he richly merited. But why pile Pelion upon Ossa in reciting the well-known proofs that Americans and American influence, direct and indirect, have from the foundation of our Government aided in the overthrow of thrones and the establishment of republics? But for the dread of American power half the American continent would be under the rule of kings to-day, upheld on their thrones by the influence of monarchical Europe.

The Administration's outrageous course will be overwhelmingly condemned by the American people. Grover Cleveland and his policy, already emphatically repudiated by the voting millions last Tuesday, will be doubly repudiated when this infamy becomes known. The nation whose loyal sons bled on battlefields from Gettysburg to the Rio Grande that a government of the people, for the people, and by the people should not perish from the earth will never sanction the restoration of a justly deposed and degraded monarchy over the sons of Americans in Hawaii.

Secretary Gresham's report making this disgraceful proposal is dated October 18, and was obviously withheld by the Administration until after the election. If it had not been, the Republican majority at the polls would have been vastly greater than it was—nearer 75,000 than 35,000 in Massachusetts, nearer 200,000 than 100,000 in Ohio, and nearer 300,000 than 135,000 in Pennsylvania.

After months of opportunity for considerations the Administration that now controls the official acts of the United States has decided to suppress the Government which the best residential elements in Hawaii had set up on the ruins of one of the rottenest thrones ever sat on by debauched and debauching monarchy and to give such moral support as this country has intrusted to its care to the woman who claims by descent and by "divine right" authority to sell the interests of her "subjects" to the highest-bidding lottery sharks and the opium smugglers who will divide most liberally with her majesty the proceeds of their illegal acts. The uprising of the better elements of Hawaiian population, sympathized with by a vast majority of the American people, is therefore to be nullified by influences that while officially American are more nearly British in the manner of their working. With American residents owning more than one-half of Hawaiian property and conducting the greater proportion of Hawaii's trade and with practical acquiescence by most of the natives in the situation as it was before Minister Paramount Blount was injected therein, this Government concludes to upset conditions that are at least semisatisfactory, elects to encourage conspiracy and provoke bloodshed, joins hands with the outlaws who have manufactured the uproar against the republican idea, and all to the end that a far from admirable specimen of womanhood be reclad with power to work great evil. To say that such a position is an astounding one is to speak mildly.

That the course of the Administration is indefensible must be evident to all reasoning people. It matters not now how the revolution was brought about; that it occurred is history, but with those causes the President can have nothing to do. Both President Harrison and President Cleveland have recognized the Provisional Government as a power, the latter having sent to that Government two representatives. President Cleveland might withdraw the American minister if he simply desired to let the two factions fight it out among themselves; that would be an unfriendly act. But to drag the throne from out the royal woodshed and, after dusting it off with the frazzled hopes of honest Americans, replace the low-comedy queen on its cushions is an act of hostility toward a friendly power which neither the Americans of Hawaii nor those of the United States are likely to forget. Responsibility for the destruction of American interests and influence in Hawaii and for bloodshed and loss of life which may result from this effort of the great Republic to bolster up a rotten pro-English monarchy will be upon the Administration of President Cleveland. And the burden will be heavy.

[The Washington Post.]

THE PROPOSED HAWAIIAN POLICY.

Mr. Gresham startled the country yesterday morning by proposing the forcible suppression of the existing de facto government of Hawaii and the equally forcible restoration of the burlesque monarchy deposed nearly a year ago. His theory is that the power of the United States was employed to consummate a wrong in the first instance and that the same power should now be invoked to vindicate justice by committing another. If Mr. Gresham had spent the whole period of his incumbency as Secretary of State in planning a theatrical effect he could not have been more bewilderingly successful.

With the issue of veracity raised by Mr. Gresham as against Minister Stevens and his own predecessor, Secretary Foster, we have nothing to do. We prefer to keep to the undisputed facts of the case and to seek in them such justification of Mr. Gresham's proposed policy as they can be made to furnish. Whatever may have been the circumstances under which the Hawaiian monarchy was overthrown last winter, it is nevertheless true that the Cleveland Administration, upon coming into power two or three months later, found the present government installed at Honolulu. No matter what Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Gresham may as private citizens have thought of the methods by which that government was set up, it remains the fact that as President and Secretary of State, they found that government an accomplished and perfected entity, and it is equally true that they have recognized and dealt with it as such ever since. Of course nobody knows the exact nature of the instructions under which Mr. Blount acted while he was exerting his paramount authority by special and mysterious commission, but there can be no question that upon succeeding Mr. Stevens as minister plenipotentiary he gave official recognition to the then existing arrangement at Honolulu.

Nor can it be asserted that Mr. Blount was merely tolerating a government on paper or conniving at a temporary expedient, for one of the earliest manifestations of his paramount authority had been the hauling down of the United States flag and the transfer of the United States marines from their barracks there to their quarters aboard the Boston. The vessel's presence in the harbor after that act of official repudiation was no more of a support of the Provisional Government than of the deposed monarchy, perhaps not as much, and the former, from that day to the present has stood upon its own feet and by virtue of its own strength.

We do not find in Mr. Gresham's statement of the case, and we imagine that it is about as unfavorable a statement as could be made, the very smallest warrant for the hypothesis that the present government of Hawaii is destitute of inherent strength and incapable of maintaining itself. On the contrary, it seems to us that it has sufficiently contradicted such a proposition by exerting its authority and commanding the respect and obedience of the Hawaiian ever since the day on which Mr. Blount called off the United States forces and somewhat ostentatiously left it to stand alone.

There may be a question as to the means by which the revolution was accomplished originally, but there can be none as to the present reality and substance of the de facto government, or, in our opinion, as to the impropriety of foreign interference in a situation which the parties chiefly concerned appear to have accepted with entire satisfaction. If, as Mr. Gresham insists, the deposed monarchy is backed by an overwhelming public sentiment, it will reëstablish itself without aid from us. If not, and if the existing government be rooted in the people's sympathy, and inherently capable of self-support, the employment of the United States forces to overthrow it would be an act of the grossest and most wicked tyranny.

We do not see that the present Administration need hold itself responsible for the misdeeds, real or imagined, of its predecessor; but, even if it were responsible, we find it equally difficult to imagine why an outrage connived at by Mr. Harrison should be followed by an outrage planned and executed by Mr. Cleveland. The proposition that two wrongs make a right has never yet been accepted by the enlightened moral sense of the civilized world.

The report (by Mr. HOUK of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass., respectfully report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The light and fog-signal station herein provided for was recommended to be established in the annual report of the Light-House Board for 1892; and that recommendation, as we are assured in a letter from Hon. C. S. Hamlin, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, will be renewed in the forthcoming annual report and annual estimates of the Light-House Board. The letter containing that assurance and an extract from the annual report of the Light-House Board of June 30, 1892, are filed herewith and made a part of this report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 16, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from your committee dated September 13, 1893, inclosing House bill No. 156, for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.

This bill with your letter was referred to the Light-House Board, which returned them with the statement that in its annual report for 1892 recommendation was made that an appropriation of $45,000 be made for the establishment of a light and fog signal at Butler Flats. This recommendation is renewed in the forthcoming annual report and annual estimates of the Light-House Board.

A copy of the recommendation made by the Light-House Board in its report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, is inclosed, together with a copy of H. R. bill No. 156.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Extract from the annual report of the Light-House Board, June 30, 1892.]

Butler Flats, New Bedford Harbor, Buzzards Bay, Massachusetts.—The following recommendation, which was made in the board's last three annual reports, is renewed:

"The entrance near buoy No. 9, on the point of Butler Flats, is narrow, obscure, and difficult to find in snowstorms, fogs, and dark nights. If a light with a fog signal was placed on that point it would mark both the entrance and turning point; would guide vessels to an anchorage in the lower harbor, and, with the light on Palmer Island, would guide them clear of North Ledge, Henrietta, and Hurricane Rocks, in Buzzards Bay, and be of great service to the navigation of this important port. It is stated by the custom-house authorities that 1,814 vessels entered the port of New Bedford during 1887, not including yachts, fishing craft, or boats. It is also stated that the Vineyard Sound and Nantucket steamers took 75,000 passengers to and from this port, and received $22,500 for freight carried. It is further stated that the New York propellers made 104 trips between New York and New Bedford, and received over $100,000 for freight carried. New Bedford is now said to be the third manufacturing city in Massachusetts, and the collector of the port states that about 500,000 tons of shipping came into the port during last year.

"The board, as stated in its last annual report, is of the opinion that the needs of commerce and navigation require the establishment of a light and fog signal at this point. It is estimated that they can be erected for $45,000, and it is recommended that an appropriation of this amount be made therefor."

Mr. RANDALL. This bill calls for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal on Butlers Flats at New Bedford. The city of New Bedford is an important seaport in the southeastern part of Massachusetts, and Butlers Flats is a ledge of rock covered by shoal water at the entrance of the harbor of that city, and directly in the track of vessels arriving at or leaving that port.

At present the only guide or warning of danger to sailors on this flat is a gas buoy, which is a structure made of boiler iron, weighing from 2 to 5 tons, charged with compressed gas, and costing from $2,000 to $5,000; the gas burns with a steady flame from three to four months. It is anchored to a sinker, weighing from 3 to 5 tons, by a chain cable. It can not constantly be kept in its prescribed position, as it may be driven from its moorings by storms, and is so liable to be displaced by moving ice during the winter season that it is the practice of the Light-House Board to replace the gas buoy with a spar buoy when such movements are feared, as in cases when the ice in the harbor breaks up and goes to sea, taking every buoy with it which it does not sink. It also sometimes happens that the light goes out, and as it is remote from the shore it is not easily accessible from the shore in storms, and has to remain unlighted. In foggy weather, when it can not be seen, it is useless to the mariner as locating a point of danger.

The Light-House Board has repeatedly recommended the establishment of a light-house and fog signal on this reef, and a statement of facts and figures will, I think, show that this work should be done immediately.

The population of the city of New Bedford, Mass., has increased within the last fifteen years from 33,000 to 50,000.

During the same period the number of spindles in its cotton mills has increased from 75,000 to 1,000,000; making it now the second place in this country in its number of spindles.

The number of steamers and sailing vessels arriving at that port in 1891 was 2,117, with a tonnage of 1,097,193.

The number of tons of coal landed at this port in 1891 were 490,690; the largest number in one day, 8,660. Number of bales of cotton used annually, 125,000; sacks of wool, 2,493; bushels of grain, 615,250; barrels of flour, 128,181; lumber, 12,500,000 feet; sugar, 15,000 barrels; grain, 650,000 bushels; iron and steel, 11,000 tons; besides articles of merchandise of great value, too numerous to mention.

A daily line of freight propellers leaves New Bedford for New York; also a line of passenger and freight steamers for Nantucket and the adjacent islands, carrying in the summer from 150,000 to 200,000 passengers.

Beyond question the establishment of a light-house and fog signal called for by this bill will in the course of a very few years result in the saving of property and perhaps many lives, and considering the importance of the work, the amount asked for to complete it is comparatively insignificant.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the method in which appropriations have been made for the construction of light-houses. The Light-House Board has always divided these works into three classes: first, the indispensable; second, the necessary; third, the desirable. Now, it nowhere appears from this report or from any information as yet received from the Light-House Board whether this light-house is indispensable or necessary or desirable.

I would therefore ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to withdraw it and to permit it to remain on the Calendar for the present, so that we may ascertain from the Light-House Board, in an official manner, whether this structure is indispensable or necessary or desirable. And I will say to him that if the Light-House Board report officially that the construction of the light-house in question is indispensable, then I will have no further objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the bill from further consideration, with the request that it remain on the Calendar, and move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 156) had come to no resolution thereon, the bill having been withdrawn from consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that this bill remain on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It will so remain.

CASH ENTRIES OF OFFERED LANDS.

When the Committee on the Public Lands was called—

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries of offered lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all private cash entries of public land subject to sale in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas as offered lands, made between the dates of the approval of the joint resolution of May 14, 1888, and its promulgation, May 29, 1888, in cases in which all requirements of law have been complied with, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McRAE. This bill, Mr. Speaker, was reported just before the adjournment of the last session, with the reservation of all of the rights or privileges that it may have had, and I submit that it does not belong on the Union Calendar, having been considered in the Committee of the Whole House and reported favorably to this House.

The status of the bill is this: When under consideration October 26, 1893, it was reported to the House with an amendment, was engrossed and read a third time in the House. At this stage the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands with instructions to ascertain the amount of land covered by the bill and the purchasers thereof, which has been furnished the House in Report No. 169, made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SOMERS].

No action on the part of the Committee on Public Lands whatever, except to obtain the information desired, has been taken. The bill remains just as it was when recommitted. So the committee insist, Mr. Speaker, that the bill comes back to the House with the information desired by the House, and occupies the same parliamentary status as when it was recommitted. The question is, Shall the bill be passed as amended? That was the pending question when the bill was recommitted, and I submit is the question now.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any authority on the questions which he has suggested?

Mr. McRAE. I have no special authority, for I never knew before a bill to be recommitted for information; but it seems to me that there can be no question about it, for there is no other sensible and logical step to be taken. The bill has had its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, reported to the House, the amendment adopted, and the bill engrossed and passed its third reading. Shall all this be done again? Nothing remains to be done now except to determine whether the House will pass the bill or not after hearing the report which contains the information which has been called for by the House.

The SPEAKER. There seems to have been a ruling on the question, which is found on page 494 of the Digest:

When, in pursuance of Rule XVII, a bill, pending the question on its passage—

That the Chair understands to be the case presented here—has been recommitted with instructions to the committee to amend it, the bill as thus amended is again reported to the House and occupies the same parliamentary status as when first reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole. It is in effect a different bill, and the vote must be again taken on the question "Shall the bill be read a third time," and when the question is again on its passage it is again subject to one motion to commit as provided in Rule XVII.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, that decision is not applicable to the status of this bill. There was no instruction to the committee to amend this bill. It has not been amended. It was recommitted solely for the purpose of obtaining certain information which has been reported to the House. There could be no amendment reported by the committee under the instructions. The bill itself has been amended, as shown by the italicized words in the bill, but this was done in the Committee of the Whole, reported to the House, adopted by the House, and the whole matter was taken out of the hands of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was this bill considered in Committee of the Whole to its conclusion?

Mr. McRAE. To its conclusion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then it has already had its consideration in Committee of the Whole. If it had not been considered to its conclusion, but pending the conclusion had been recommitted, it would have to go back to complete the action upon it to a conclusion in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the question of the gentleman from Arkansas to be whether the motion was on the third reading or the final passage of the bill. It is very clear that if it had its first consideration in Committee of the Whole it need not go there again.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly it has had its first consideration, and was reported to the House before recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then it must now be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair the question should be, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. SPRINGER. It is presumed that it has not been engrossed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] will give his attention. Has the committee reported back the information which was asked for?

Mr. McRAE. Yes sir. That report was sent up by me with the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill was recommitted with instructions to the committee to ascertain certain facts. The committee report the bill back with a statement of the facts which they were directed by the House to inquire into.

Mr. McRAE. It is Report 169.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest that the table containing the names and the descriptions of the lands contained in that report might be omitted in the reading. The printed matter which follows will give the information.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the information, the Clerk will omit the names contained in the report and read what follows.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report as directed.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries of offered lands was recommitted on the 26th of October last, with instructions to ascertain the amount of land covered by the bill, and the purchasers, and the amount purchased by each person, respectfully report the same back to the House, with the following letter from the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office, which contains all the information obtainable by the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1893.

SIR: In reply to your verbal request for a report supplemental to that rendered by this office October 9, 1893, on H. R. bill No. 1829, "For the relief of Charles A. Hall," which shall show the amount of land covered by the bill, the names of purchasers, and the amount purchased by each person, I have the honor to submit the following statement, showing the dates, names, area, and amounts paid by the purchasers on private cash entries made in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama, between May 14 and 29, 1888, as well as the disposition thereof:

In Mississippi there were 21 cash entries made, aggregating 3,053.83 acres, for which $3,817.32 were paid. All of these entries have been patented.

In Arkansas there were 35 cash entries made, aggregating 3,908.20 acres, for which $4,885.48 were paid. Of this number 32 have been canceled, because they were made without authority of law, these canceled entries aggregating 3,623.74 acres, and 3 were patented, aggregating 284.46 acres. The purchase money on 9 of these canceled entries has been refunded, amounting to $789.63. Applications have been made for the repayment of the purchase money paid on 2 of said entries, amounting to $150. Granting that these two applications will be allowed, it is seen that the sum of $3,945.85 is covered into the Treasury, while the entries for which said sum was paid have been canceled, and the purchasers have received no benefit therefrom.

In Alabama there were 21 cash entries made, aggregating 3,602.50 acres, for which $4,503.15 were paid. All of these entries are suspended, four of them being before the Secretary of the Interior on appeal from the decision of this office holding them for cancellation because they were made in violation of law.

Thus in the three States of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama offered Government lands were purchased at private sale, between the dates named, to the amount of 10,564.53 acres, for which there was paid the sum of $13,205.95.

Of this total area, entries covering 3,602.50 acres are suspended in this Department; patents have been issued for 3,338.29 acres; entries covering 3,623.74 acres have been canceled, of which amount 701.33 acres have been absolutely returned to the public domain, since after the cancellation of the entries the purchase money was refunded to the purchasers, leaving 2,922.41 acres, the entries for which might be reinstated, if no adverse claims have attached, should Congress pass the necessary legislation therefor, or the purchase money for which might be refunded upon the proper application of the purchasers.

Should the bill under consideration become a law in its present form, the suspended entries, representing 3,602.50 acres, would be passed to patent, and the patents already issued would be confirmed should their legality be ever questioned.

Should a clause be inserted in the bill allowing the reinstatement of the canceled entries upon application therefor, and where no adverse claims have attached, entries to the amount of 2,922.41 acres might thus be reinstated.

These lands were purchased under the provisions of the act of June 22, 1876 (19 Stats., 73), no act of settlement, cultivation, and improvements being required of the purchasers.

The operations of said act were suspended by the joint resolution of May 14, 1888 (25 Stats., 632), as amended by the joint resolution of July 16, 1888 (ibid., 636), and the private sale of lands in the United States, except the State of Missouri, was prohibited by the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stats., 854).

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX,
Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I think this report sets out very clearly the necessity for the passage of this bill. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Before that is done I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MCRAE. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. How does the gentleman account for these single parties getting so much of this land? As I hastily footed it up here, one man has 2,500 acres.

Mr. MCRAE. In the States named in the bill, prior to the passage of the law of 1889, all these offered lands were subject to sale to anybody who would pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for them, without requiring residence, cultivation, or any other conditions except the payment of the money.

Congress repealed that law. Now, between the date of that law and the date of the fact of its promulgation these entries were made. In many of these cases, as you will see, the entries have been canceled and in some the money refunded. A number of them have passed to patent, and the bill deals with these and the pending entries, and confirms the title in all such cases. The Government has received the money for the lands.

Mr. PICKLER. That is, between the time of the passage of the law and the time when the land officers received notice of the passage of the law, some of these gentlemen rushed to the land office and got this amount of land.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not know whether they rushed or not. They made the entries anyway, entered the land, and paid the money. The Government has had the money for several years, and ought to make good the title.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand that three men obtained 3,000 acres of this land?

Mr. MCRAE. I have not made any calculation to see how much each man got.

Mr. PICKLER. One man, Jared C. Martin, got 2,500 acres, as I foot it up.

Mr. MCRAE. In what State is that?

Mr. PICKLER. It is one of the first names on page 2 of this report. I do not know from what State the man comes.

Mr. MCRAE. The Jared C. Martin sales have all been canceled, although his money has not been returned to him. He does not come in under this bill, as the gentleman will notice if he examines the report.

Mr. PICKLER. Then whose lands remain intact?

Mr. MCRAE. Such of them as have been patented, and such of them as have not been canceled are confirmed. We do not by this bill reinstate canceled entries.

Mr. PICKLER. Has the Secretary of the Interior recommended the passage of this bill?

Mr. MCRAE. He has.

Mr. PICKLER. Not in this report.

Mr. MCRAE. The bill for which this is a substitute was sent to the Secretary originally; and the Secretary and the Commissioner of the General Land Office both recommended the passage of a general bill. This report simply contains the additional information as to the area covered by it that the House desired before it would vote upon the bill. In the State of Arkansas, to which the gentleman has called attention, there are only two entries that are affected by it, and they have passed to patent. They are very small, one being 80 and the other 45 acres. All the others have been canceled. So far as I am concerned, I do not care whether you pass the bill or not; but I do say that it is but little short of an outrage for the Government to have kept the money of these people from 1889 and now hesitate about giving back the money and refuse to confirm their title to the land.

Mr. PICKLER. I was only seeking to understand the bill. I do not know whether I am for it or not. It appears, however, that some of these parties have entered a very large amount of land, did it very quickly, and only paid $1.25 an acre for it.

Mr. MCRAE. If the case of Martin is a scarecrow to the gentleman, I repeat that his entries have been canceled, and there is no proposition here to reinstate them. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and on the final passage.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCRAE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF TIME TO PURCHASERS OF FORFEITED LANDS.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3544) and will yield the floor to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3544) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," be, and the same is, amended so as to extend the time within which persons in possession of lands forfeited by said act shall be permitted to purchase the same, in the quantities and upon the terms provided in said section, at any time prior to January 1, 1897.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MCRAE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The title was again reported.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

After the word "purposes," in line 5, insert the words "approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof."

In line 7 strike out the words "in possession of," and insert in lieu thereof the words "entitled to purchase."

After the word "ninety-seven," in line 10, add the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any adverse claim that may have attached to the lands or any part thereof."

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, how much of the hour remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that twenty-five minutes of the hour remains.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is one that does not involve any appropriation. It is simply an amendment of an act that has been heretofore passed by this House, giving to certain persons who are entitled to purchase under the act of September 29, 1890, certain forfeited railroad lands in the West and giving them an extension of time. The time in which they were to make the payment expires on the 1st of the coming January, and by reason of the hard times and failures of crops they will not be able to meet their payments upon their lands; and if they do not make the payment the lands will simply revert to the United States, and then can only be acquired under the homestead laws; and only such persons will come into possession of these lands as are entitled to do so by operation of the homestead laws. Thereby the Government will lose the price of the lands, whereas if the settlers are permitted to purchase and are given this extension of time, within that time they will be enabled to complete the purchase and the Government will realize $1.25 per acre for such lands.

Much of this land has been settled upon by persons who have exhausted their homestead rights and have no homes except the land they occupy, which they took under license from the railroad company prior to the forfeiture of the land. Since the act making the forfeiture passed and the lands reverted to the Government, they were permitted to purchase under certain restrictions contained in the act of September 29, 1890; but by reason of the reversal of fortunes which they have had they are not able to meet their payments in the time prescribed, and they are simply asking an extension. They ask until January 1, 1897.

This matter has been submitted to the Department and to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who recommends the passage of the bill with an amendment, which has been incorporated:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any adverse claim that may have attached to the lands or any part thereof.

That amendment is perfectly satisfactory to those people, and all they ask at the hands of Congress is that the time may be extended that they may be permitted to pay for these lands, not upon the 1st of the coming January, but on or before the 1st of January, 1897. By that time they will be able to pay for their homes, and the Government will be $1.25 better off for each and every acre of land, and these men will be permitted to hold their homes.

Mr. COOMBS. Are they simply homestead lands?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. No, sir; they are not homestead lands, but they are part of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company which were forfeited in 1890 and have reverted to the Government.

Many of these men had already exhausted their homestead rights, and in some instances had homes upon inferior pieces of land valuable only for water privileges, and in order to have lands valuable for agricultural purposes occupied the lands they now seek to hold by virtue of a contract made with the railroad company; in many cases taking lands which were a mile or two from where they resided and used them for farming purposes, their homesteads being unfit and inadequate to their wants unless they are permitted to hold the forfeited lands to which the right of purchase had attached September 29, 1890, which right will not be enlarged but only extended if the pending measure should become a law.

By the provisions of this act with its amendments they are permitted to buy at any time prior to the 1st of January at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. COOMBS. How much land?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. In no case to exceed 320 acres.

Mr. PICKLER. Lands upon which they have made improvements?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Yes; lands upon which they have made improvements and which they had signified their intention or were entitled to purchase from the railroad company prior to the passage of this act. Many of these people were bona fide settlers upon the lands by virtue of a contract of purchase with the railroad company, and when the land was taken out of the hands of the railroad company and reverted to the Government, Congress provided that it might be purchased in quantities not to exceed 320 acres by anyone who had complied with the provisions of the act of forfeiture. There was also an order from the Interior Department that within so many days after the passage of that act persons claiming under it should file notice in the Land Office specifying the particular lands that they intended to purchase, and where any man had more than 320 acres he had to specify the particular 320 acres he would take, and the surplus was made subject to entry by any other qualified person. Hence only 320 acres can be obtained under this character of claim by any one person.

These settlers want to have the privilege of purchasing the lands upon which they had settled and improved, and not to lose them, as many of them will in case this act of extension is not passed. This does not involve the appropriation of a dollar of public money. On the contrary, it brings money to the Government, because these people will pay for their lands at $1.25 an acre, while if this extension is not allowed many of them will lose the lands upon which they have made improvements and be left homeless, and others will be allowed to come in and take the lands under the homestead law and get the benefit of the labor and the improvements made by these settlers. This extension asked for is no more than a simple act of justice to deserving settlers.

Mr. PICKLER. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. The report of the committee is unanimous. The extension is also recommended by the Interior Department, and I earnestly ask that the bill may pass.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were read, as follows:

After the word "purposes," in line 5, insert the words "approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof."

In line 7 strike out the words "in possession of," and insert in lieu thereof the words "entitled to purchase."

And, in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, after the word "ninety-seven," in line 10, add the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any adverse claim that may have attached to the lands or any part thereof."

The amendments were severally agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3544) in relation to the forfeiture of certain lands, had amended the same, and had directed him to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that, as amended, it do pass.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended, as recommended by the committee, by adding after the word "purposes," the words "approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof."

Mr. McRAE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND ENTRIES IN MILLE LAC INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for land within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all bona fide preëmption or homestead filings or entries allowed for land within the Mille Lac Indian Reservation in the State of Minnesota between the 9th day of January, 1892, the date of the decision of the Secretary of the Interior holding that the lands within said reservation were subject to disposal as other public lands under the general land laws, and the date of the receipt at the district land office at Taylors Falls, in that State, of the letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, communicating to them the decision of the Secretary of the Interior of April 22, 1892, in which it was definitely determined that said lands were not so subject to disposal, but could only be disposed of according to the provisions of the special act of January 14, 1889 (25 Statutes, 642), be, and the same are hereby, confirmed where regular in other respects, and patents shall issue to the claimants for the lands embraced therein, as in other cases, on a satisfactory showing of a bona fide compliance on their part with the requirements of the laws under which said filings and entries were respectively allowed.

Mr. McRAE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read. It states all the facts in the case.

The report (by Mr. HALL of Minnesota) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota, have had the same under consideration and report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The Mille Lac Indian Reservation (owned by the Chippewas) was ceded to the United States in 1863 and had been declared open to entry by successive decisions of the Department of the Interior.

The most of the lands were entered prior to January 14, 1889. An act approved January 14, 1889 (25 Stat., 642), provided for the purchase from the Chippewas of all their reservations in Minnesota (except the Red Lake Reservation), and also for the sale of the lands, and the setting apart of the proceeds of such sales as a trust fund for the Indians. This act further provided for an examination of the lands, and their separation into "pine lands" and "agricultural lands." The "pine lands" were to be sold at auction at their appraised value, and not less than $3 per acre, and the "agricultural lands" were subject to entry under the homestead law.

On January 9, 1891, the then Secretary of the Interior held that the Mille Lac Reservation, having been ceded in 1863, was not embraced in the reservations covered by the act of January 14, 1889, and therefore that the Mille Lac lands were subject to disposal as other public lands under the general law.

Under this ruling, and prior to May 3, 1892, there were made upon these lands 109 homestead entries, aggregating 13,628 acres, and 131 preëmptions, aggregating 17,991 acres, and 1 soldier's declaratory statement, covering 40 acres; in all, 31,659 acres.

Afterwards, on April 22, 1892, the Secretary of the Interior reversed his former ruling and held that the lands were not subject to disposition under the general land laws, but under the special provisions of the act of January 14, 1889. This decision was communicated to the local land offices on May 3, 1892.

The object of the pending bill is to confirm the entries of said lands, made in good faith under the ruling of January 9, 1891, and between that date and the time when said ruling was reversed and the local land officers notified thereof. The occupants of these lands made their entries and paid their money under the general land laws and in accordance with the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior. The subsequent reversal of that ruling by the same Secretary ought not to deprive them of their equitable right to these lands.

The present bill was approved by the late Secretary of the Interior, passed the Senate, and was favorably reported to the House in the last Congress. It also meets the approval of the present Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the report states the facts quite fully, and unless some gentleman desires to be heard upon the subject I move that the committee rise and report the joint resolution to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration joint resolution (H. R. 31) in relation to entries of lands in the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. MCRAE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

BIRMINGHAM, SHEFFIELD AND TENNESSEE RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 198) to grant to the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Company a right of way over the public lands traversed by it.

The b ll was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of way through the public lands of the United States, 100 feet wide on each side of the center of the track now laid by the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Company, in the State of Alabama, is hereby granted to said railway company upon condition that said railway company shall, within six months after the passage of this act, file with the register of the land office at Huntsville, Ala., a map showing the Government lands traversed by it; and upon approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the said lands shall be noted on the plats in said office, and all such lands over which said right of way passes shall hereafter be disposed of subject to such right of way.

There is also granted to said railway company the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material, earth, stone, and timber necessary to complete the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of its road.

An amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the words "right of way," at the end of line 14, to the end of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is not this a bill that ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is on the House Calendar.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It grants but very few acres of the public lands, worth but a few dollars.

Mr. DINGLEY. That does not affect the principle. The simple statement of the gentleman from Alabama shows that this is a bill that should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. This bill should be on the Union Calendar. It grants a right of way.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered at this time. I will simply state that the railroad was entitled under the law to the land over which it goes, but there was a requirement in the law that the company should file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement or plat of the land over which the road was proposed to be built, but they failed to do this. Afterwards they made application to the Department; but the Secretary held that inasmuch as the law was so explicit some additional legislation was necessary.

Mr. PICKLER. Have any intervening rights accrued?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. None whatever. This is simply to perfect the title of the railroad company to the land over which the road runs.

Mr. DINGLEY. Land which is covered by their track?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And which had been granted previously?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It had been granted because the company built the road before making the application. The road was built rapidly, and the Secretary of the Interior contended that as the statute had not been strictly complied with in making the application before the road was built, there must be Congressional action. This matter amounts to very little; yet it is better that the title should be absolutely perfect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Public Lands were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] any further business to submit?

Mr. MCRAE. I have no other business this morning.

The SPEAKER. Then as the morning hour would expire in a minute and a half the Chair, without objection, will declare the hour at an end.

There was no objection.

ROLL CALL AT OPENING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the bankruptcy bill——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I wish to make a point of order in reference to the correction of the Journal and the RECORD.

Mr. OATES. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, since yesterday I have made an examination as to the practice of the House of Representatives from the beginning of the Government to the present time, and I have before me a statement of the method pursued in the calling of the roll at the convening of every Congress from 1789 to the present time.

I find that invariably members of the House have been recorded by States, and in many cases the record shows that the Speaker directed the roll to be called by States at the commencement of second sessions and also at the convening of third sessions. I think I am justified in saying that the record shows that the Speaker directed the Clerk to call the roll by States at the convening of second and third sessions quite as frequently, and probably more frequently than at first sessions. The idea in the early Congresses was that there should be a quorum of States as well as a quorum of members. It is true, the Constitution does not in words provide that the presence of Representatives from a majority of the States to make this a legal body for business, but I insist that the spirit of the Constitution and the spirit of our institutions is as I contend. I insist that before a Congress proceeds to business, whether it be a first, second, or third session, we should ascertain and place on record the fact of the presence of a quorum of members, and also that this quorum of members should be composed of Representatives from a majority of the States; and even if it is not essential, it is a good practice, and it is one that has been adhered to from the beginning of our Government to this time.

At the first meeting of the First Congress there was neither a majority of States nor a quorum of members present. At the meeting of subsequent Congresses there sometimes failed to appear a majority of States, which fact would not have been developed had not the roll been called by States. I regard this, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of great importance. During fifty-two Congresses, including one hundred and fourteen sessions, the practice has been invariably as I have stated. Yesterday when the question was raised the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] very soon saw the point, and saw that this innovation was the beginning of an encroachment upon the revered Democratic principle of the sovereign character of the States and a great stride in the direction of centralized government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the point of order that the Journal should show that the roll was called by States, and that the permanent record should be corrected to show the same thing. Should the Speaker decide that this can not be done, I make the point of order that the roll of the House should now be called by States, so that there may be an unbroken precedent from the beginning of the Government to the present time, namely, that at the convening of every Congress the roll has been called by States. I repeat that at the convening of every Congress, whether first session, second session, or third session, the roll has been called by States, and this is the first time that this rule has been deviated from. The innovation upon this principle which I seek to correct is not justified by the rules of the House. The rules, so far as they affect the subject, have been for many years precisely as they are to-day, and there is no rule which prohibits the roll being called by States.

FIRST CONGRESS.

The first session of the First Congress convened March 4, 1789. The record of both the Senate and House show that both Senators and Members were recorded by States. It was called accordingly by States.

FIFTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

First session Fifty-second Congress convened December 7, 1891. The RECORD shows the roll was called by States.
Second session Fifty-second Congress convened December 5, 1892. The RECORD shows that the names of members were called by States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair of course must enforce the rules as the House has made them. The rules provide in clause 1 of Rule III:

The Clerk shall at the commencement of the first session of each Congress call the members to order, proceed to call the roll of members by States in alphabetical order, etc.

The only provision in the rules for calls of the roll after the House has been organized is to be found in clause 1 of Rule XV:

Upon every roll call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically.

When this House met yesterday it was thoroughly organized, and business was resumed under the rules of the House precisely as though there had been no adjournment. Rule XXVII provides that—

All business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress in the same manner as if no adjournment had taken place.

The Chair can not see how, under the rules, he could direct the roll to be called in any other way than alphabetically. The gentleman from Alabama calls attention to the fact (and of course the Chair accepts his statement) that heretofore on the convening of Congress, even at a second session, the practice has been to call the roll by States. The Chair does not know, of course, why that was done; there was no rule requiring or authorizing it. The present rules provide, as the Chair has stated, that all roll calls, except at the organization of a Congress, shall be alphabetical. The Chair can not see that any right of anyone can possibly be affected injuriously.

The gentleman has spoken of a quorum of States; but there might be a quorum of the House organized to do business, and though half a dozen States might not have a single Representative present, that quorum of members could go on and transact business. There is not required a majority of the States to constitute a querum for the transaction of business, but a majority of the members.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In the Senate prior to the war it was the universal custom to require the presence of a quorum of States.

The SPEAKER. The Constitution of the United States provides that a majority of the members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and no rule or practice can alter that provision.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I simply made the point that the practice has been invariable on this point during fifty-two Congresses.

I think it is just as important to call the roll by States ading pro-beginning of a second and third session as it is at the beginning of a first session.

I do not think that Rule XV has any application to this question. The language of the rule is:

Upon every roll call.

If this was strictly construed it would apply to and control and contradict Rule III.

I think the construction that has been placed upon this question at the convening of one hundred and fourteen sessions of Congress, from 1789 to the present day, ought to be adhered to. I am thoroughly in favor of recognizing States in their individuality in every possible phase and form of legislation.

The autonomy of States is the sheet anchor of American liberty. It should be recognized, revered, and respected by Congress, and the people should be impressed with its importance for the same reason that soldiers and patriots are taught to revere and respect the flag of our country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must hold that the roll has been properly called.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire whether this revived apprehension of the encroachments of "centralized power" has been suggested by the extraordinary character of the Executive message read at the desk here yesterday. [Laughter.]

BANKRUPTCY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. OATES. Pending that motion I desire to ask the consent of the House to an agreement which has been made among members of the Committee on the Judiciary as to limiting the time for general debate on this bill. Seven days have already been consumed in this debate; and we have agreed among ourselves that the additional time be limited to six and a half hours, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] shall control four hours and I the remainder.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama to limit debate in the manner he has indicated?

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

Mr. OATES. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that he has already had his time, and his colleague has agreed to this arrangement. The gentleman himself had an extension of his time.

Mr. BAILEY. It can be done by a motion.

Mr. OATES. Then I move that all general debate be limited to six hours and a half.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, four hours will be assigned to the gentlemen in opposition to the bill and two and a half to those in favor of it.

The motion of Mr. OATES, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill has been limited to six hours and a half; and under the agreement the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] controls four hours of the time in opposition, and the gentleman from Alabama the remaining two hours and a half in favor of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill is not one of the things that the people of this country are clamoring for at this particular time. It occurs to me that it is not designed to fill the aching void of any long felt want. The advocates of this bill have mainly contended for its passage on the idea that some such measure was necessary to "restore confidence" and create a "basis for credit." I have failed to learn, if it be a truth in political economy, that men are made honest by legislation. The percentage of men who meet their obligations on account of a fear of the law is a very small one. The man who is determined to be a rascal and to beat his creditors is not going to be deterred, in any very large measure, by any statute that you may enact. The history of all bankrupt laws proves this, if it proves anything.

The Clerk

Sena'am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who believe, that one of the best things that Government can do, is to let the people alone. In the recent repeal of the Federal election laws, and all their concomitants of fraud and force, we have repudiated that monstrous heresy in a free government of trying to put a "bayonet behind every ballot," and have emphasized the grand declaration which Bulwer places in the mouth of Cardinal Richelieu, "Take away the sword; states can be saved without it."

The deliberate proposition to pass through the American Congress, a measure like that now before the House, is but another evidence of that vicious tendency of the times towards paternalism and centralization of power, and the constant effort to thrust the officious hand of law into all the affairs of human life, and supervise and regulate the business and conduct of men, as if they were mere machines, incapable of honest and intelligent action of their own. I undertake, sir, deliberately to assert, that too much law and too little justice, is the crying evil of the age; and to enact a law like this, is simply to pile another stone upon that "Cæsar's column" whose towering height already shadows more than half the world.

The most beneficent purpose for which State and national legislatures can now assemble, is not for the enactment of new laws, but for the repeal or modification of laws already enacted.

As I understand it, sir, the fundamental axiom—the great cardinal principle of democracy is, that the individual is king in his natural rights, and that society and government is based upon the surrender of only so much of these rights as is necessary to protect public morality, provide for the general welfare and promote the common good; that beyond the scope of that surrender, the functions of government legitimately do not extend, but that within that scope its powers are supreme and that every individual owes allegiance to the State: That as with the individual to the State, so with the State to the nation, the sovereignty of the State being based upon the surrender of certain rights of the individual, and the supremacy of the National Government being based upon the surrender of certain rights of the States.

This then, Mr. Chairman, I take to be democracy pure and undefiled: that the individual, the State, and the nation have each its own peculiar rights and its own peculiar province, beyond which neither of the others may justly go, and that no outside power should ever be permitted to interfere with or shape the conduct or policy of either—administrative, legislative, political, governmental, financial, or otherwise. That, sir, is democracy! That, sir, is true Americanism upon the best, the broadest and the highest plane!

As to the particular bill now under consideration, with a favorable report from the Judiciary Committee, I trust I can be permitted to say with no impropriety that I can not believe that a majority of the members of that committee are in favor of its passage. I was not able, sir, to be present when it was up before the Judiciary Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member.

Mr. OATES. Just there, will my colleague on the committee allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly, sir.

Mr. OATES. The votes of the members of the committee who were present at the time the bill was ordered to be reported were all in its favor, save two. There was not a full attendance, but there was a quorum present.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman, perhaps, did not comprehend exactly the statement that I made.

Mr. OATES. I admit this, and I wish to state it just here: My friend was not present. There was an understanding among the members of the committee present, as this bill substantially in its present form had been considered in the last Congress by the full committee for three months, that it was unnecessary to consume so much time as it would require to read the bill and consider every section and paragraph; and wherever an amendment has been put and voted down, if the member offering it indicated a disposition to have it passed in the House, the committee reached an agreement that if the bill were reported here, while no considerable number of members desired the passage of it precisely in the form in which it was, or if they wanted to amend it, I, acting as chairman of the committee at the time and being in charge of the bill, and it being understood that I would have charge of it on the floor of the House—I stated to the committee that if they thus reported it and we came to consider it under the five-minute rule, I would see to it that they all had ample opportunity to offer amendments and be heard upon them in the House, and in that way we could determine whether the House wanted to pass the bill or not.

Mr. TERRY. I do not, for an instant, doubt the correctness of the statement made by my honorable colleague of the committee on that point; but this bill comes here, apparently, as the bill favored by a majority of the Judiciary Committee; and my statement was simply this, Mr. Chairman, that I can not believe that a majority of the members of that Judiciary Committee favor the passage of this bill. I do not believe they do.

I will further state, Mr. Chairman, and I think it proper that I should, that during the last Congress certain organizations in my district transmitted to me resolutions in favor of the Torrey bankrupt bill. And I will take occasion now to say that for the gentlemen, composing those organizations, I entertain feelings of the most profound regard; but I am satisfied that they would not have adopted those resolutions after a careful consideration of the many objectionable features of this bill.

I can not hope, sir, in the time that I shall occupy, to elaborate many of the objectionable features that it presents, but I shall endeavor, if I can get the attention of the House, to call attention to a few of them at least, and first to the "acts of bankruptcy" or acts for which a person may be "adjudged a bankrupt."

Now, with regard to these, Mr. Chairman, it is first to be observed that the test provided in the bill is not as to what may be the debtor's condition or conduct immediately prior to the time proceedings are commenced against him. He may be solvent then and his conduct honest in every particular; but if he had formerly concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence or domicile, etc., although he may have returned, in perfect good faith; or if he had failed for thirty days, while insolvent, to secure the release of property levied upon under process of law, for $500, though he may afterwards have procured such release; or if he may at one time have made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors, though he may have repented of such purpose and obtained a reconveyance; or, if at one time he had "made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property, etc., for the purpose of giving a preference," though he may have rehabilitated himself. Nevertheless, notwithstanding all this, if, six months before any petition is filed against him, he has done any of these things, his right to have dominion of and manage and control his own property and business could, under the express provisions of this bill, be swept away, and the bar sinister of "bankrupt" be burned upon the shield of his reputation forever!

Is that just? Is that humane? Is it right between man and man, and can the legislative policy of this great Government, of the greatest civilized nation upon the earth, tolerate the enactment of such a law for the oppression of its citizens?

And yet, Mr. Chairman, just such proceedings are authorized under this bill—the great "olive branch" and "offering of peace" that a very large and eminently respectable portion of the creditor classes of this country are holding out to their unfortunate debtors.

In view of just such monstrous propositions, that are so often paraded as the very "essence of true benevolence," is it any wonder, sir, that it is rapidly becoming a saying in this country "God help the rich; the poor can beg."

Let us examine this feature of the bill a little further, and we find that it absolutely makes no difference what may be a man's financial condition or standing at the time he is proceeded against, if six months before that, his property could not be sold for enough to pay all his debts, his property can all be swept away from him and into a court of bankruptcy, all the same as if he was then insolvent or then engaged in acts of dishonesty or fraud. But that is not all. Ah, sir, it is but the beginning. If at any time within six months before, and whilst he could not help himself, he "failed for thirty days to secure a release of any property levied upon under process of law," even though that process may have been an attachment wrongfully sued out; or if twelve months before, he had made, however honestly, "an assignment for the benefit of his creditors," or if within six months prior, and whilst he could not help himself, a number of executions, aggregating $500, had been sued out against him from a lot of little J. P. courts, and finding no personal property, at that time, outside of exemptions, had been returned nulla bona, under the operations of this bill, a debtor could be deprived of the control and management of his property and business and adjudged a bankrupt, although perfectly solvent at the time the adjudication is made.

But outrageous, sir, as are these features of the bill, they are merciful indeed when compared to that other under which a debtor may be declared a bankrupt if at any time within six months before the petition is filed against him he made any kind of a gift or pledge or transfer, or turned over even a dollar's worth of his property by way of preference, however honest or however meritorious may have been its moving cause.

Let us look at that for a moment. It may have been some small requital due some poor neighbor who stood by him in the darkest hours of his life—who had put up his own last dollar to enable him to procure medicine or medical attention for a dying child, or to help him to put away, with decent burial in the bosom of mother earth, the lifeless form of the wife that God had given him; and yet for such an act as that, praiseworthy as it may have been in the eyes of all honest and Christian men, and sanctioned as it was and is by the great common law of the land and by the uses and traditions of the English-speaking race for more than five hundred years of its glorious history—for such an act as that, Mr. Chairman—done six months before a petition in bankruptcy was even thought of, that debtor, no matter what may have been his circumstances at the time of the petition, is, by the express provisions of this bill, made liable to be declared a bankrupt, and not only by a district judge, but even by the contemptible edict of a petty referee, and to have all his property swept away, consumed in litigation, attorneys' fees and costs, and his standing and reputation as a business man blackened and destroyed forever!

Such, Mr. Chairman, are some of the potentialities of the provisions of this most remarkable measure. Its benign features are nowhere visible to the naked eye; and yet, sir, in some mysterious way they have so manifested themselves to the members who reported it, that they have not been content to laud its virtues in simple prose, but have invoked the language of the immortal Shakespeare to proclaim in behalf of its inscrutable beneficence that

> The quality of mercy is not strain'd;
> It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for what this bill denominates the "Acts of Bankruptcy," for which an American citizen is to be put upon trial, and if found guilty of any one of them, to have his property taken away from him at one fell swoop and turned over to a horde of petty Federal officials, trustees, referees, clerks, pettifoggers, deputy marshals, et id omne genus, composing too often that delectable pack that "bark in the kennels of justice."

We now come to the tribunal before which he is to be tried, and here we find that an unfortunate debtor who has been pounced upon by a proceeding in bankruptcy, may be dragged a hundred miles from his home—called up before a Federal judge in some distant city—possibly to be turned over for trial before some petty referee—not even tried before the majesty which enrobes itself in the ermine of the Federal judiciary—turned over to the mercies of a petty referee—to try the dearest rights of an American citizen—and that petty referee, some miserable creature owned, perhaps body and soul, by the creditors or their attorneys—there, before such a tribunal, to be pulled and hauled around, vexed, harassed, browbeaten, perchance kept a prisoner for days, weeks, and months, "in the custody of a deputy marshal!" (So reads the law.)—His ready money all spent, his property all consumed or wasted, his business all broken up, and, if acquitted of the charge brought against him, no bond, absolutely, sir, NO BOND, upon which to claim indemnity for the outrages and injuries inflicted upon him!

If he demands a jury trial, even that may be denied him. Even a jury trial may be denied him, unless he happens to be lucky enough to have filed a written application for it within ten days—the brief time allowed him to plead—less time, sir, or not any more time, than is allowed a man to plead in a justice's court in Arkansas when sued for the ownership of a flea-bitten mule. [Laughter.] What show, think you, Mr. Chairman, would the average debtor have when once within the clutch of such proceedings as these? Stripped of the dearest right of an American citizen—a right guaranteed him not only by the Constitution and laws of the United States but by the constitution and the laws of every civilized nation on earth—tricked out of such a right as that, unless he has been lucky enough, within ten days of the time that the summons is made returnable, to file his written application for a jury trial.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman how far a man might be taken under this proposed law in the State of Texas to answer for his debts? Might he not be taken 500 miles?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir. "But," say the advocates of this measure, "a debtor can only be adjudged a bankrupt upon an impartial trial." But what does the bare phraseology of that sentence amount to when you come to examine the machinery provided in the bill itself? What boots an empty phrase from which all the balance of the bill is a complete departure? And what would an "impartial trial" itself amount to when, by the very terms of the bill itself, the bare proof of the facts to which I have before referred, is made sufficient in law to have him declared a bankrupt? A conscientious jury of his own neighbors, sworn to enforce the law, would be compelled to find against him, and a jerked-up jury specially summoned for the trial, as the bill provides, could readily be formed to decide against him, no matter what the proof.

But even the proof itself, upon which some vital point may turn, may consist of "certified copies of proceedings before a referee," or "papers issued by a referee"—which the bill provides shall be "admitted as evidence," with the same "binding force and effect as records of district courts of the United States." Not only is such machinery as that provided to try the property rights of an American citizen, but, when it comes to any controversy arising in the settlement of the estate, a party can absolutely be arbitrated out of his rights by three arbitrators, one appointed by the trustee and another by the referee! What show would a fellow have before a board with two-thirds of it organized against him? The bill does not even require that the arbitrators shall be sworn!

Why, sir, in my State a board like that would not be allowed to sit as appraisers on a heifer calf! [Laughter.] I do not wonder, sir, at the just indignation of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], who in discussing this bill declared that in his State, when a gang of men set out to accomplish jobs like that which this bill provides for, they "took a crowbar and a jimmy."

Advocates of this measure, industriously seeking to point out some redeeming feature, have constantly reiterated that it can not affect the farmer; that it expressly provides that he can not be adjudged a bankrupt against his will. But let no man deceive himself, or be deceived by any such talk as that. If the farmer owes the town or country merchant, or has given him a mortgage, this bill provides the machinery for the enforcement of that debt, and the foreclosure of that mortgage, and if this bill is enacted into law the farmers all over this land may soon find themselves face to face with this situation: that whilst their local merchant, or their home creditor, with whom they have dealt and whose custom it has been to carry them over and grant them indulgences and extension of time, and may still be willing to do so, he will be himself in a bankrupt court, stripped of all power to grant a minute more of time, and an officer of the bankrupt court will be pouncing down upon the farmers themselves for the immediate payment of all such debts and the sale of their property under mortgage. I take it, sir, to be no exaggeration to say that that, perhaps, is one of the very purposes of this bill. They want to get hold of those mortgages.

In view, then, Mr. Chairman, of all these matters of weighty moment, I ask, sir, can this House afford to pass this bill? Tell me, in all the history of this country, in all the course of its legislation for more than one hundred years, when was it that a Democratic Congress ever enacted a bankrupt law?

Mr. BLAND. Does not this bill propose to exempt farmers from the operation of its provisions?

Mr. TERRY. It provides that they can not be adjudged bankrupt against their will; that is the substance of the provision.

Mr. BLAND. Is not that a confession that it would be an injustice to impose the provisions of this bill upon farmers?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Why, then, can it be just to anybody else?

Mr. TERRY. I will leave that question to be answered by those gentlemen who in some mysterious way, as I have already stated, have been able to see the beneficent features of this bill which are not visible to the naked eye.

Certainly if there ever was a time for the passage of a bankrupt law the present is not such a time. Going back a moment in regard to bankrupt laws formerly passed by the Congress of the United States, gentlemen on the other side have quoted the Constitution as if its provisions were mandatory, requiring us to pass a bankrupt law. There was a law of this kind passed in 1800. It was not a Democratic measure; neither was the bankrupt act of 1841 or the bankrupt act of 1867. None of these were passed by a Democratic Congress. The act of 1800 was a mere temporary act, limited in its duration to five years; and its workings were such that there arose from the entire country a clamor against it; and it was repealed within a short time after its passage.

The next act of this kind was the act of 1841. It was intended to be a permanent law, but it was absolutely repealed by the very same Congress that enacted it. When members went home and touched their bases, and heard how the people were "walking and talking," they came back and repealed that act.

In regard to the act of 1867—if there ever was a time when a bankrupt law might seem justifiable, it was at the time of the passage of that act. But what lawyer does not remember the crimes, the perjuries, the vices, the outrages, the oppressions that sprang up under the act of 1867? I can not do better in pursuing this line of discussion than to quote from the message of President Grant, in reference to the act of 1867. He said:

> Careful and prudent men very often become involved in debt in the transaction of their business, and though they may possess ample property, if it could be made available for the purpose to meet all their liabilities, yet on account of the extraordinary scarcity of money they may be unable to meet their pecuniary obligations as they become due, in consequence of which they are liable to be frustrated in their business by proceedings in bankruptcy at the instance of unrelenting creditors.
> People now are so easily alarmed as to monetary matters that the mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy by an unfriendly creditor will necessarily embarrass and oftentimes accomplish the financial ruin of a responsible business man. Those who otherwise might make lawful and just arrangements to relieve themselves from difficulties produced by the present stringency in money, are prevented by their constant exposures to attack and disappointment by proceedings against them in bankruptcy, and beside the law is made use of in many cases by obdurate creditors to frighten or force debtors into a compliance with their wishes and into acts of injustice to other creditors and to themselves.

Why, sir, in those words of that great soldier, he seemed, as it were, with a vision as clear and sweeping as that with which he ever looked forward to formulate his plans of battle, to pierce through the gathering mists of intervening years, down to the very time in which we to-day move and act, and to be speaking of just such a condition of things as to-day confronts the American people. Under such conditions that soldier President believed that a bankrupt law, less objectionable than the measure now before us, was a thing to be reprobated by the American people.

Yes, sir, at a time like this, when so lately there has been heard from ocean to ocean the crash of falling values, to say nothing of what may be yet to come as the SHADOW OF THE YELLOW STANDARD shall continue to advance—to say nothing of what may be yet to come—I hope it may not come—is this a time for us to think of passing a bankrupt bill?

A long course of vicious legislation running through more than a quarter of a century of this nation's history has bred and battened a horde of giant monopolies, trusts, and combinations that are now battening upon the lifeblood of the American people. And to pass a law like this at the present time would be like rendering the people paupers by legislation and then by one general act passing a law to put them into the hands of a receiver.

Ah, sir! mark well my words; it is no time to be flying kites when there is lightning in the air! This is no time for a Democratic Congress to be passing a bankrupt law. It is a time when debtors all over this land are struggling to maintain their footing, and are compelled to rely upon the kindly aid of their neighbors and their friends. At such a period, when they are compelled to rely upon such neighborly offices, is no time to be depriving their neighbors of the right to extend them a reasonable indulgence; and that, sir, would be one of the direct effects of this bill. This is no time, sir, for a Democratic Congress to be passing a bankruptcy bill that imposes pains and penalties and forfeitures upon the requital of such indulgences.

The people, sir, have demanded no such legislation at our hands. There are other things they have demanded at our hands. They have demanded that we wipe out all legislation in the interest of particular classes and inaugurate legislation in the interest of the masses. They have restored the Democratic party to power in every branch of this Government. They have commissioned it to go forward in the pathway of reform of the existing abuses. I repeat then, sir, that there are other things which have been demanded at the hands of Congress. For the first time in more than a quarter of a century the Democratic party has been placed in power in every branch of the Government—commissioned by th epeople with a high and a holy duty. They have commanded it to go forward, with a purpose as national as the flag and a policy as broad as the bounds of the great Republic, and restore this Government to the pure principles upon which the fathers founded it.

What grander commission could be confided to any party, or to any band of freemen than to restore this Government to the principles upon which our forefathers founded it. Why, sir, when administered according to those principles, it is the grandest Government that God's sun in all its course ever yet shone upon. No grander, purer principles were ever formulated into a plan of human government, and when administered, Mr. Chairman, according to these principles, it stands forth the one unrivaled conception that American genius has added to the master works of man. Lofty in its conception, pure in its design, majestic in its proportions, massive in its strength, it stands upon the very summit of human achievement, the Parthenon of unequaled glory.

Fraternity is its broad foundation and justice its cornerstone—each pillar a sovereign State, its arch the Federal compact and its keystone the Constitution. And, Mr. Chairman, upon the very front of the keystone of the arch, in order that all the generations that might come after may read and understand the purpose of its existence and the object of its creation—upon the very front of the keystone of the arch, in the preamble of the Constitution itself, is written the object and purpose of its creation. And, sir, one of the first of all the objects there enumerated is to "establish justice."

Read you and consider this bill and answer for yourselves whether it is calculated to establish amongst the American people that justice for which our fathers did lay so broad, so deep, so strong thefoundations of the great Republic. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield twenty minutes additional time to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee rise, Mr. Chairman, temporarily.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. MCMILLIN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, a letter from the governor of the State of Illinois was presented to the House this morning by the Speaker, and laid on the table. I ask unanimous consent to take the letter from the table and have it read for the purpose of offering a resolution in reference to the matter to which the letter refers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the letter, after which the resolution will be read, and the Chair will then ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Springfield, December 2, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor, as well as the pleasure, of advising you that in pursuance of an invitation extended to the States by authority of Congress, the Legislature of the State of Illinois at its last session caused Mr. Leonard Volk, a distinguished American sculptor, to make a heroic statue in bronze of Gen. James Shields, one of Illinois' most distinguished warriors and statesmen. The same has been placed in position in Statuary Hall at Washington, and will be unveiled on December 6, of this year, at the hour of 2 p. m.

I respectfully invite your friendly coöperation. I have advised the President and the President of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

JOHN P. ALTGELD, Governor.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution which the gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to consider at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 6th day of December, at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon be designated and set apart for the consideration of the following concurrent resolutions:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Illinois, for the statue of Gen. James Shields, whose name is so honorably identified with the history of the State and of the United States;

Resolved, That this statue is accepted in the name of the United States, and is assigned a place in the old hall of the House of Representatives, already set apart by act of Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of Illinois.

There being no objection, the resolutions were considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee resume its sitting.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the power of Congress to pass the bill now under consideration, for section 8 of the Constitution provides (among other things):

The Congress shall have power * * * to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

But it does not follow as a matter of course, Mr. Chairman, nor would I so maintain for a moment, that simply because our fathers saw proper to give Congress this power that therefore it must necessarily be exercised. In fact, although this provision of the Constitution has been in full force and effect for a hundred and six years, we have had bankruptcy laws on our statute books but about eighteen years in the aggregate—less than one-sixth of the period of time covered by the Constitution.

As I construe it many of the provisions of this great instrument are and were so intended to be, merely directory in their character, to be adopted, exercised, and enforced, permanently in most cases, but temporarily in others, as the exigencies and circumstances of the times might warrant and demand.

Mr. Chairman, while the fact just stated, that Congress has heretofore exercised its authority to enact and enforce bankruptcy legislation but a small portion of the time since the formation of the Government is a somewhat significant fact, and a strong argument perhaps that such legislation has not been deemed necessary for the welfare of the people, yet it is not in my judgment by any means conclusive, for it is conceded on all hands, as I understand, that the various laws heretofore enacted on this subject (three in number) were very crude, imperfect, and oppressive in their provisions and operations, so that instead of affording the relief intended, by the spirit of the Constitution at least, they became burdensome, onerous, and offensive.

Instead of affording the honest insolvent debtor a prompt, speedy, and fair distribution of his assets among his creditors as far as they would reach, and an honorable discharge from the unpaid balance of his indebtedness, so that he might thereafter start anew in life, these various laws seemed to provide a machine, a method by which the unfortunate bankrupt's property was eaten up in costs and expenses pertaining to the administration of his estate, and hence their speedy repeal after but brief trials.

Nor does it follow, in my humble judgment, that because Congress has failed thus often heretofore to adopt good, practical, satisfactory laws on this subject that none can be or should be enacted now.

By reason of the fact that by this same Constitution the States are prohibited from adopting laws impairing the obligation of contracts it is absolutely necessary that Congress should act in order to accomplish one of the great objects and purposes of that section of the Constitution first quoted by me, viz: The discharge of all honest insolvent debtors from all fair obligations.

Mr. Chairman, this should be the first and primary purpose of all national bankruptcy legislation. It may be argued—in fact, it has been said upon this floor by some of the able gentlemen who have preceded me in opposition to this bill—that the several States have power to grant this discharge as to all domestic or local indebtedness. So they have; but even if they exercise the power, which has been done but infrequently, if I mistake not, this would afford but a partial and poor relief in this regard at best; for in the first place, as a general rule, perhaps, a portion of the indebtedness, and frequently the greater part of it, is to parties residing outside of the particular State in which the debtor resides. And in the second place, it is the debtor's especial desire in nearly every instance, and very naturally, too, to be relieved, forever released, from this distant foreign indebtedness, if you please, rather than of that in his own neighborhood, perhaps to his immediate friends and neighbors.

The second object and purpose of a wise bankrupt bill, and of no less importance than the first, should be the fair, economical, prompt, and equitable distribution of the bankrupt's estate among all his creditors. And in my humble judgment, Mr. Chairman, this also can be accomplished much better by uniform national legislation rather than by the various and oft conflicting, inconsistent, and ever-changing laws of forty-four States. In truth and in fact every business man—substantially every business man who will be affected by this bill should it become a law—is both a debtor and a creditor every day of his active business life. They are inseparable. We should never forget while considering this question that in an active business life, pertaining especially to merchants and traders, every debtor is more or less a creditor, and every creditor is more or less a debtor. And hence whatever law will justly and fairly and without discrimination benefit the creditor will per se as a rule benefit the debtor, and vice versa.

And firmly believing that this bill, if amended in certain particulars, a part of which I will indicate before I take my seat, will be in the nature of a benefactor to both of these classes, I shall vote for it.

I say if amended in certain particulars, because, Mr. Chairman, I betray no secret of our committee or violate no rule of the House when I say that it was expressly understood and agreed at the time this bill was reported to the House that in its present form it did not meet with the approval of a large portion of the committee. In fact, it was conceded, as I understood it, by a large number of the committee that the bill was faulty in several minor respects at least, and hence that ample time should be secured and had for its careful consideration in the House, and that each member of the committee especially should be permitted to offer such amendments as he might desire and deem necessary to perfect the bill before being put on its final passage.

Some of the committee, it is true, as has already been stated on the floor here during this debate, were opposed to all that portion of the bill relating to involuntary bankruptcy, and but one or two of the committee, as I understood, being opposed to a bankrupt law in toto. Hence, while not desiring or intending to censure or criticise any of my learned colleagues on the committee, I can not refrain from expressing my surprise at their general opposition to the bill, seemingly in whole and in part. In accordance with that understanding the friends of this measure, or rather, perhaps, the friends of good bankruptcy legislation, a majority of the committee, invite a free, full, and fair discussion and the adoption of any and all amendments necessary to make it more fair, just, and perfect to secure the great end of this character of legislation, but protest against its defeat simply because it may be imperfect in its present form.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with close attention and much interest, as I always do in fact, to the able speech of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee in opposition to and in condemnation of this bill; and while I would not presume for a single moment to enter the arena of discussion with him upon any question, and while I have the greatest respect and esteem for him personally and recognize and admire his rugged honesty, integrity, and great ability, yet I am constrained to say, after carefully considering and weighing his argument, that in my humble judgment the greater portion of it must fall to the ground simply because it is based on false premises. To illustrate what I mean by this statement: In the first place he assumes that all United States district courts, district judges, or nearly all, are putrid (using his own strong language) with fraud, oppression, wrong, injustice, perjury, and tyranny. Now on behalf of these courts and judges in my own State (Ohio) I must most respectfully and yet emphatically enter my protest against any such assumption. On the contrary, from what little experience I have had before these courts and judges there, and speaking more especially from general information as to their character and their manner of doing business, I do not hesitate to say that I believe justice (which is the object of all law) and the administration thereof can be had, obtained, and maintained there just as readily and as completely as in our State courts.

It is true that I regret very much that we are compelled to resort to these courts in order to preserve the desired uniformity of the law—not because I have no confidence in the Federal judiciary in Ohio, but because, as well suggested by the distinguished gentleman himself, they are more inconvenient and expensive to all parties interested in the bankruptcy proceedings as a rule, by reason of the fact that the courts are held so far away from their respective places of abode; hence on the grounds of convenience and economy, if it were possible and consistent with the great objects and purposes of this bill, I would gladly have our State courts substituted for the Federal, and would gladly vote for some amendment to that effect.

In the second place, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman assumes as the basis of his strong argument that a bankruptcy bill should be enacted solely for the benefit of unfortunate debtors; and in the third place that all debtors are honest and all creditors are oppressors and tyrants. I undertake to modestly controvert both of these assumptions also, because, repeating what I have already said, a good bankrupt law enacted and enforced under and in the spirit of our Constitution authorizing it, should operate and is intended to operate in the interest of the creditor in the same degree as that of the debtor. And my somewhat active experience as a practitioner of the law for more than a score of years, especially as pertaining to our insolvent laws, warrants me in saying that it is certainly a violent presumption to say that all insolvent debtors are honest, and that hence they alone are entitled to our sympathy and favorable consideration and legislation. On the contrary, experience tells me that but few honest debtors need any legislation for their protection other than that afforded by the existing homestead exemption laws of the several States, because if honest they can in nearly all cases secure reasonable terms of adjustment, settlement, and release from their creditors. Hence it is as a rule, Mr. Chairman, the dishonest, the fraudulent debtor with whom we have to deal, to litigate in the technical sense of the word; and in order to do it successfully it becomes necessary to have more or less stringent laws pertaining especially to the preservation and fair and equitable distribution of his property.

To illustrate further what I mean in this connection, I here again repeat that "the object of all law," as I understand it, "is justice." "Justice," says Fortescue, "is the virtue, jurisprudence the science; justice the end, jurisprudence the means." In order to do justice the jurisprudence, the means, the law should compel an insolvent debtor, if he will not do it willingly, to distribute all his property—less his legal exemptions—among all his creditors pro rata, except such as are preferred by statute law. Unless he does this he perpetrates a moral if not a legal fraud upon his creditors. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the law should prohibit any debtor in contemplation of insolvency from preferring one creditor to another. Many of the States, perhaps all of them, permit certain preference by providing that certain debts or a certain class of debts, such as taxes, claims for manual labor, etc., shall have priority.

Many of them, in fact all of them, I believe, provide that an insolvent debtor may prefer himself by way of very liberal homestead-exemption laws. I would not disturb any of these. So far as I now know to the contrary, they are just, wise, and humane laws. Neither does their existence on the various statute books disturb or weaken the force of my argument against preferences. For both debtor and creditor are presumed to know the law, especially the statute law; and when they deal with each other on credit they are supposed to do it in the light and with the knowledge that by existing law certain debts enumerated in the statutes are preferred, and the insolvent debtor is entitled to certain exemptions, running from hundreds of dollars in value in some States to thousands of dollars in others.

But as to all other property of the debtor, Mr. Chairman, the creditor believes and has a right to believe that if his debtor shall meet with misfortune and become insolvent, he shall share pro rata in his assets; and he makes his purchases, sales, and contracts based on that just belief, and hence if, in the face of this, the debtor is permitted to prefer still other creditors or classes of creditors it works a great injustice upon this particular creditor and virtually robs him of his just dues to that extent.

By way of further illustration and to show the necessity of some national legislation, I will state that it has become the rule rather than the exception in my State, and doubtless in other States, for insolvent debtors who make assignments for the benefit of their creditors (under the various State insolvent laws) to prefer one or more creditors, not in the deed of assignment itself, for that is prohibited by law in Ohio, but by other written instruments and transfers immediately preceding the execution or filing of the deed of assignment. And in a great majority of cases these preferences are given to the immediate relatives of the assignor, his wife, father, son, brother, mother-in-law, or nephew, or all of them—the very persons on the strength of whose financial standing or credit, perhaps indirectly, if not directly the debtor obtained the goods or money from his creditor or increased the obligation. And yet, although all this may have been done but five minutes before the filing of the deed of assignment and to the extent of fully exhausting the insolvent's estate, our supreme court has recently held (see Cross vs. Carstens, 49 O. S. R., 548) that this may lawfully be done providing, of course, the debts thus preferred and secured were bona fide. It did, however, in its opinion, by inference if not directly, condemn the practice, and suggest that the remedy should be sought if it was desired, in the legislative branch—just what I am now advocating.

Without intending to reflect upon that able court I am constrained to exclaim (again borrowing from the distinguished gentleman from Texas) What a travesty upon justice and the spirit and intent of all insolvency laws is this! The debtor is virtually prohibited from preferring any creditor in his deed of assignment, and yet, strange to say, he may do so by executing and delivering to as many different preferred creditors one, two, three, four, five, six chattel or real estate mortgages all within one, two, three, four, five, or six minutes respectively, just prior to filing his deed of assignment, in many cases covering his entire stock of merchandise or assets. Under this bill, Mr. Chairman, no such abuse or evasion of the law can be accomplished. Hence for this reason especially I favor the bill, for it will not only prevent this daily wrong and injustice but will ultimately prove beneficial to the deserving debtor inasmuch as it will strengthen his credit by thus depriving him of the power to prefer one general creditor to the injury of another. It will prove not only beneficial to the debtor class but to all the consumers of the land, because they will then be enabled to make their various purchases at a certain per cent less, which additional amount the wise creditor now imposes, in fact is compelled to impose, in order to cover possible and probable losses that may be incurred by reason of these very common and unjust preferences.

Mr. Chairman, in a very recent assignment in my own village, made by gentlemen, partners engaged in the milling and grain business, the assignors, not content with preferring a certain large creditor, a national bank—an institution not especially beloved by the gentlemen from Texas, I believe—by giving it an additional mortgage on their real estate immediately before the assignment, proceeded also to give the bank at the same time a chattel mortgage upon all or substantially all of their personal property, the result of which was that some thirty, forty, or fifty farmers of the immediate vicinity, old customers and most of them poor men who had deposited their wheat with them for their winter's bread—as is customary in our country—in quantities ranging from perhaps 50 to 500 bushels each, were compelled to accept about 10 cents on the dollar for their wheat, while the rich bank was paid in full.

Which illustration, Mr. Chairman, and numerous others of an analogous character which have come under my own personal observation, goes to show that the great wholesale houses of this country are not the only creditors by any manner of means who are materially interested in the adoption of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, in order to protect debtors from oppression, and afford him redress for any injury or damage he may wrongfully sustain in case a wrongful attempt is made to force him into bankruptcy, the creditor or creditors who institute the proceedings should be required to give a good and sufficient bond of indemnity. This is required in my State, and perhaps in all the States, in cases of attachment, and for like reasons it should be required here, and an amendment to the bill to this effect should be first adopted.

Section 8 should also be amended so as to provide that in case of the decease of the bankrupt after proceedings have been commenced his widow and children shall be entitled to the benefit of the set-offs and exemptions allowed them by the laws of the respective States in cases of administration of decedents' estates, as provided in the amendment, as I understand it, proposed by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. Chairman, after the adoption of these and some other minor amendments which my time will not permit me to now indicate, I shall vote for the bill, firmly believing that such legislation is necessary and that it will prove a blessing to all deserving debtors as well as the deserving creditors of this land. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time of Mr. LAYTON having expired—

Mr. CAMPBELL said: Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. OATES yielded five minutes, and subsequently five minutes additional.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] ten minutes.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to every section of it. I am opposed to any substitute for it. I think it a pernicious bill in the interest of the great creditor class and against the best interest of the debtor class. I think it an oppressive measure which if enacted into law will do more real injury to the small creditors of the country merchant than any act Congress could pass. Three times in the last ninety-three years the same principles embodied in this bill have been enacted into law by Congress, and each time in an incredibly short period repudiated by the people; and yet in the face of that history we find the wholesale merchants and boards of trade attempting it again.

In 1800 a bankrupt law was passed by Congress embodying substantially the same principles as the bill now under consideration. Its provisions were tried by the country, and found so obnoxious that in less than three years it was repudiated by the country and repealed by Congress by an overwhelming majority. So injurious and oppressive was this law that it did not survive a single Administration.

Again, in 1841, the same law in principle was tried, and the same Congress which passed it was compelled to repeal it. Not content with two trials with adverse verdicts, its advocates again, in 1867, made a motion for a new trial and Congress granted it. But like its former twin brothers it was also rejected by the popular will of the people and in less than four years after its passage the House voted twice to repeal it but it was sustained by the Senate until 1878, when opposition to it became so fierce even the Senate was compelled to yield to the popular demand for its repeal, and accordingly in 1878 the bankrupt law of 1867 was wiped from the statute books, and again the seal of condemnation placed not only upon the law, but upon the principle of that kind of a law. So that in a period of ninety-three years, in three distinct generations, each with new and improved ideas, this same law was repudiated and rejected by the people. The bill in principle has had three distinct, fair trials by separate and impartial juries of three intelligent generations, and each time the same kind of a verdict was returned and our statutes purged of the law.

And here, again, Mr. Chairman, in the year 1893, well-nigh on to a fourth generation of people, the same old putrid carcass of a thrice-repudiated law is thrust before Congress. A fourth motion for a new trial is made by its friends, alleging the same causes upon which new trials were granted its friends three times heretofore. Although not one of the judges that granted the new trial in 1867, I was one of the jury that signed the verdict against it. And now, being one of the judges in this instance, I am to pass on a motion for a new trial on the same law in principle that I signed the verdict that repealed it. With no better light or sufficient reasons for the law now than then, it can easily be judged what my decision on the motion will be. Although almost a quarter of a century has passed since the repeal of the last bankrupt law, yet the country has by no means forgotten the oppressive and loathsome effects of that law. Lest some of the particulars of that ruthless bankrupt law of 1867 be forgotten, the friends of the proposed measure are reviving the memories of the past.

I am opposed to the bill because like all other bankrupt laws it is an attempt on the part of the wholesale dealers of the country to invoke the aid of a powerful government to collect their private debts off the small merchants and retail dealers of the country. It is an effort to secure a law whose effects will be to drag the small retail merchant of the country away from his home, often many hundred miles, and force him into a United States bankrupt court, if misfortune should overtake him and he could not meet a debt aggregating $500. I oppose a bankrupt law for the reason it furnishes the means for the hungry, idle hanger-on around courts to devour and consume the assets of the unfortunate country merchant or trader who has fallen into the clutches of a merciless wholesale dealer.

I oppose it because it drags the small creditors, often the farmers and laborers, of the small retail merchant, long distances from home into strange courts and indirectly compels them to employ lawyers and pay large fees to establish their little claim, and in the end get little or nothing on their claim. It often occurs that the greater number of creditors of a failing retail merchant are the farmers of the neighborhood who have sold him the little surplus of wheat, or corn, or pork, the only reward for a hard year's work, or it may be the wages of labor, or it may be that the merchant has sought and obtained the loan of small sums of money from his neighbors, as is often the case.

This bill if passed would force these men I have mentioned in a distant United States court, to establish their claim and wait the will and pleasure of some rapacious officer or officers after their greed for fees have been satisfied for his pro rata share of what is left. Mr. Chairman, there are some debts more binding in conscience than others, and I believe a failing merchant or trader ought to be permitted to prefer such creditors as in good conscience he feels most bound to pay. This bill denies him that right. This bill puts the poor man on an equal footing with the rich in the distribution of what is left of a bankrupt estate after all expenses of administration are paid, which means about all of the estate; but it also puts the small creditor at a disadvantage with the opulent creditor in this, that often after traveling expenses to and from court and lawyer fees and witness fees are paid, whatever amount is received in the final distribution has been consumed in expenses.

The farmer who has taken the risks of a blighted and failing crop by drought, winds, and floods, and managed to have a meager surplus at the end of the year, sells that surplus to the country merchant on credit, is now subjected to a double risk of getting little or nothing out of his claim by being forced into a bankrupt court to establish his claim and await what always is unfavorable and unsatisfactory results. The creditor of the failing debtor may be some poor widow woman, who despite all the hardships incident to her struggle for an existence has by close economy managed to have a small surplus product which if sold for cash would perhaps pay her tax. She must be subjected to a long wait through the slow process of a bankrupt court and in the meantime suffer perhaps because she can not collect her debt, and perhaps herself be sold out by the taxgatherer of the county.

This bill denies the debtor in such cases the right to prefer his debt to the widow. But, Mr. Chairman, aside from all the justly harsh criticisms that might be made of this bill or any other embodying its principles, I am opposed to the passage of any bankrupt law, at least at this time, because no considerable portion of this country is demanding or even asking Congress to pass such a law. Who is demanding the passage of this law? A few of the wholesale merchants of the country, boards of trade, and opulent corporations alone are asking for it. No laborer has asked for it. No labor union has knocked at the door of Congress for its passage. No farmer has been heard to cry out for the passage of such a law. No small country retail merchant is asking for it to enable him to compromise with his creditors and be discharged from the payment of an honest and just debt.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have never heard of a single man in my district even suggest the idea of Congress passing a bankrupt law, much less demanding it. I have been in close touch with all my constituents ever since I have been in Congress and know something about what they want, I think, and I have the first word to hear from any constituent and the first letter to receive from anybody asking me to vote for such a law, or even counseling the propriety of passing such a law. No newspaper has ever published a single editorial or even thought it necessary to mention such a law, there being absolutely no demand for it anywhere in my district.

The people have not considered this matter. They have not discussed it. They have not had an opportunity to express an opinion on it at the polls and are unprepared to have thrust upon them at this time a law of such vital and far-reaching effects. Its provisions are not understood by any considerable portion of the people for whom we are to legislate. Those most affected by it understand least about it, and I am opposed to its passage until there is some kind of a general request for it, and its principles and provisions are understood by the country. I seriously question the policy of Congress passing any law until it has been asked for more generally by the country and its principles thoroughly discussed by the press and people. I believe it bad policy to lay aside great measures demanded by the people or even delay them to consider this or any other bill not asked for by any great number of people and certainly not understood by them. The people generally know what they want and have the ability to make their wants known to their representatives. I shall vote against this bill in any form.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time of Mr. BRETZ having expired—

Mr. BAILEY yielded five minutes more.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] one hour.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Chairman, I shall oppose this bill. In doing so I shall make no captious objection, and shall impugn the motives of no man who favors the bill.

I have an abiding fear that members of this House who intend always to vote fairly will vote for this bill—those who do vote for it—without fully understanding it. No man can understand its many ingenious provisions at one or two readings, nor without careful study, and that will develop it into what may be denominated "a scheme."

The principle of bankruptcy is admitted to be a humane one. The bankrupt bill of 1867 was passed with the humane purpose, partly at least, of relieving the people of the South, who had been overwhelmed by misfortune. The voluntary provision is a humane one. It is the involuntary provisions of this bill to which I object.

Upon an examination of this document it will be found that there is little else in it than the involuntary clauses. It shows forth on every page that the author of the bill, Judge Torrey, had nothing else in his mind but the involuntary clauses.

On the second page of this bill the animus of it appears. One would naturally suppose, if the professions of its friends were candid, and in the interest of the debtors who have honestly failed, that the bill would commence by providing voluntary bankruptcy for them and add to that clauses authorizing involuntary bankruptcy. But the reverse is true. The main if not sole object seems to be to collect debts in an arbitrary manner. I quote from the bill:

A person against whom a petition has been filed shall include a person who has filed a voluntary petition.

It never occurred to the author to provide for a voluntary bankrupt; that was not in his mind nor was it his intention, but in the provision for involuntary bankruptcy he incidentally provides for the man who wants to go into bankruptcy. Here is his definition of the word bankrupt:

"Bankrupt" shall include a person against whom an involuntary petition or an application to set a composition aside or to revoke a discharge has been filed, or who has filed a voluntary petition.

The provisions are first these weapons for creditors, then a voluntary bankrupt is incidentally permitted to come in. To make this machine more effective, more powerful, and more easily wielded, nearly everything is to be done in a summary manner. First, they enlarge the powers of a court for this purpose. Now, I want to know from these learned lawyers, old and young, in what case except bankruptcy the powers of a court are enlarged to administer a particular law in favor of the plaintiff and to the detriment of the defendant—depriving him of rights guaranteed to him in other cases under general law?

This bill, full of cruel and oppressive provisions, enlarges the powers of the court to suit them. We have also a new dictionary here that supersedes Webster and Worcester, a sort of legal grammar, and it is proposed to enact what the English language shall mean. It provides that when a word is used in one tense, it may be used in any other tense, and mean the same thing.

"Court" shall mean the court of bankruptcy in which the proceedings are pending and may include the referee.

Further on in this bill it will become patent how much the referee is a part of the court.

The meaning of the word "insolvent" as defined by this bill has been very ably discussed. I intended to comment upon it at some length, but for the reason that it has been so ably dealt with by other gentlemen I pass over that.

Mr. Chairman, I want to come within the hour which has been allowed me, and shall occupy less time if possible. I ask now that I may be permitted to insert in my remarks what I desire in the way of statistics, without reading them here, and to extend my remarks in the RECORD. It will save time.

Mr. BAILEY. There will be no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is already leave to everybody to print.

Mr. OATES. I did not understand the gentleman's request.

Mr. BAILEY. It is to print statistics in connection with his remarks.

Mr. OATES. Of course there is no objection to that.

Mr. STOCKDALE. As I believe this bill to be unphilantropic and unpatriotic, and a machine to oppress the people, I propose to examine its provisions critically.

Among the causes of bankruptcy are these: If he shall "fail for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed." I regard that as one of the most oppressive provisions, and one of the most urgent inducements to perjury that I have seen proposed for enactment into law and should never be granted a place on the national statute books. It was said by a lawyer of some ability in my State, at one time, that "an attaching creditor sometimes swears with great facility." About then there was an epidemic of attachments in the Federal courts, to the scandal and injury of good citizens.

The Federal judges, in many instances, disregarding the decisions of the State courts, construing State statutes, it seemed almost as if judges regarded it as a duty to restrain debtors while creditors would flay them, and agents of wholesale houses would come there and sign in a perfunctory way whatever would procure an attachment writ.

Now, suppose two creditors conspire, or one alone sues out an attachment in either Federal or State court, and levies on the debtor's property. That is almost sure to invite other attachments and his property is all levied on. How is he to procure its release until the trial comes on? His creditors have deprived him of the power to give a bond by taking away his property; his credit is ruined whether he is insolvent or solvent. The court in which his cases are to be tried may not sit for three or five months, and it is impossible for him to show that he is not insolvent, and equally impossible to show that he was not guilty of any fraud for want of trial. Then one or more of these creditors, who have sworn falsely, files his petition to declare the debtor a bankrupt, no matter that he may have been perfectly solvent, but he did not release that property in thirty days and consequently he is a bankrupt, however solvent he might have been when the attack was made upon him. Stripped of his property, he is not able to try the attachment suits, and he will never see that property more; for it has been seized, and property when seized by a bankruptcy court, so far as my observation and experience go, is in the same condition that my friend from Missouri said the gold eagle was when it got into the hands of a capitalist: "Farewell, vain world; I am going home." [Laughter.]

By this provision it is in the power of one corrupt man to put a debtor into bankruptcy whether he is a bankrupt or not. It is a most alluring invitation to false swearing, to fraud, to oppression, and if enacted into law would or ought to shame the jurisprudence of America. Or suppose a man gets out an execution and levies on all or most of the property of the debtor; suppose the levy is excessive or the property undervalued; the party must go into court in order to discharge that levy, or another party to the judgment may be primarily liable to pay it all; but this debtor can not avail himself of his remedy in thirty days. But in the meantime a petition may be filed, and he may be put into bankruptcy, although he might have discharged that execution probably upon a proper valuation of the property if he had a little more time. But this bill does not intend to give proper time. It was never intended to give the debtor any right or justice before the law. He is a criminal and a disgraced man from beginning to end.

"Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors" is another act made a cause of bankruptcy by this bill. Half, if not all the States of this Union have a law that a man may assign for the benefit of his creditors. He may do that in perfect good faith, in more than half of the States of this Union, without any intention to defraud anybody, and yet here comes in this law and puts him into bankruptcy, although his property, as I have known it to be done, is enough to pay every dollar he owes. Some misfortune has overtaken a man in his business or in his family, or he may want to remove to another State to better his condition and not wait to convert his property; or he may want to accept a position with a good salary. He has not time to wind up his business, but he says "Here is my property, sufficient to pay all my debts." He makes an assignment to an assignee and gives him the power to sell and convert and pay those debts.

Mr. BOATNER. Will it interrupt the gentleman for me to ask him a question there?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Certainly not.

Mr. BOATNER. If a man finds himself in such a condition that it is necessary that he should make a transfer of his property to an assignee for the benefit of his creditors, is it not right that the creditors should have some say as to who that assignee should be?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I know that is the opinion of most gentlemen supporting this bill.

Mr. BOATNER. I ask for your opinion.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have been astonished to hear gentlemen, in whose judgment and patriotism I have the utmost confidence, argue on this bill as if the security of the creditor was the only matter to be considered in legislation of this sort and the debtor is a poor devil to be hunted down like a criminal. Now, I say, in answer to the gentleman's question, that when a debtor gives over property enough to pay his creditors; when he wants to wind up his business and go somewhere else, where he has an inducement in the shape of a large salary, and he says to the trustee, "Here is my property, take it, convert it, and pay my debts," what right is it of the creditors to say that they should have an opportunity to go in and gobble him up in a United States court, disgrace him, and hound him because he happens to be a debtor? It is his property, and he has the right to convert it in his own way into money to pay his debts and to have it done by his friend so that it will be honestly done and not wasted or sacrificed.

The oppression, not to speak of the tendency to corruption, of the power of the Federal courts, where men owing $500 were taken 200 to 500 miles from home to try their cases for that small amount, induced the Congress of the United States, to remedy the abuse and hardship it involved, to raise the jurisdiction to $2,000 as the minimum for which debtors could be taken into the Federal courts. This is a scheme to subvert and evade that law. It is a scheme to put all debtors into the Federal courts, where they can not afford to go, where they can not stand the expense of a trial, and make the United States courts again collecting agencies. A great lawyer once said, "The judge seemed to be a guardian ad litem for foreign creditors."

Who does not know that it is the disposition of the Federal judiciary to extend its power and to exert that power with an iron hand to override State courts; and I believe that the liberties of the people of America are more in danger from the Federal judiciary than from any other power. I have observed with anxiety that whenever legislation has been attempted or accomplished by Congress to curtail State rights and destroy State sovereignty, the Federal courts have been or were to be the machinery to circumscribe and restrain the rights and liberties of citizens and even exercise espionage over the ballot, the only weapon a freeman has for self-defense. If any party favoring a stronger form of government should remain in power long enough to enable the Chief Executive to appoint the judges from men who think as he desires them, and then put the power of the ballot in their hands, he will be so nearly a dictator that the temptation should not be placed in view of a strong, ambitious man.

It is not wonderful that people are a little chary of coming in contact with these bankruptcy courts. The administration of the bankruptcy law of 1867 will remain a disgrace until the records decay or are destroyed. I have here the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House in reference to certain transactions which took place in the State from which my colleague on the committee [Mr. BOATNER] comes. In the bankruptcy court of that State, held in the great city of New Orleans, the law of 1867, intended by Congress no doubt partly to relieve the Southern people after the war, was put into operation by the machinery set forth in this report. The campaign was inaugurated by this order, to wit:

Ordered, That E. E. Norton be, and he is hereby, appointed official assignee in bankruptcy of this court, to whom, upon an adjudication in bankruptcy, a surrender of all assets and estate shall be made in all cases; and he is hereby designated as the person to be appointed assignee in all cases where appointments of assignees are to be made, under section 13 of the act. And he shall be appointed "additional assignee" in all cases where the assignee elected by the creditors shall be approved by the judge, unless otherwise specially ordered.

Of this order the committee said:

It was manifestly the purpose of this order to force all bankrupt estates into the hands of Norton. Under its provisions, he took possession, immediately upon adjudication, of all assets and estate of bankrupts—real estate that was mortgaged for all or more than it was worth, as well as personal assets. By it he was appointed assignee in all cases under section 13 of the bankrupt act, in advance of any proceedings being filed without regard to circumstances or locality of the estate. And under its provisions, no matter whom the creditors might select as assignee, Norton was thrust upon them, willing or unwilling, and having, by virtue of his appointment as official assignee, already procured possession of the "assets and estate," he was able to control the entire management of such estates.

This extraordinary order is, in itself, entirely inconsistent with that care for the rights of debtor and creditor which must be expected from and required of the judicial officer having those rights in charge.

Pursuant to this order Norton became custodian in about 1,300 cases in bankruptcy. His charges were outrageously extortionate, and seem to have been generally framed to absorb the estate. In cases where a bond in pursuance of the law was required for him by the creditors, he charged 2½ per cent commission to the estate for filing his bond to secure his own official fidelity, in one case receiving $1,250 on this account alone.

In cases where real estate was mortgaged for its full value, he required from the parties interested the payment of large sums of money, varying from $500 to over $5,000, to secure the release of the property from the bankruptcy proceedings, all of which he kept by way of compensation for his services, in no case putting any part of it into the assets of the respective estates.

My friend [Mr. BOATNER] knows what became of the estates which went into the hands of Norton and Durell.

Mr. BOATNER. Is not the gentleman very well aware that this bill provides against the very kind of evil to which he is now referring, by directing that in all cases the creditors shall elect the assignee, and that no official assignee shall be appointed by the Federal court?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not desire too much of my time taken up by that sort of a speech. [Laughter.] I am talking history now.

Mr. BOATNER. Then the gentleman ought not to make reflections upon this bill which are not justified by its provisions, and if he undertakes to read history to us, he ought to read history that is appropriate.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not desire to do that, but I am reading history; does the gentleman deny it? I do not read these facts to make reflections on this bill in that particular, nor to read history that is inappropriate; I read it to show what has been the practice of bankrupt courts, and while this bill does avoid that particular opportunity of abuse, it has others that are worse, as I will presently point out and people should be wary of it. The fact that this bill withholds from the courts the powers they abused in 1867 is recognition by its supporters that there is danger to the people in these courts, and therefore these grants of powers should not be made. Now let us see what the Judiciary Committee further says. I quote as follows:

With reference to oppositions to the charges made in bankruptcy cases, Judge Durell made the following order:

"Ordered, That in all cases where an opposition to the fees of the clerk, marshal, register, and assignee is made, the matter be referred to one of the commissioners of the court for examination and report; that the party opposing shall first deposit with the clerk or the commissioner the sum of $50 to secure the costs that may be incurred by such reference, and in case the opposition be sustained the deposit shall be returned.

"It is further ordered that this order shall apply to the two cases, Nos. 1144 and 1172, referred on yesterday."

This order had the effect to prevent scrutiny into the charges referred to. It was an obstruction to justice in the matter of these charges.

The property involved in the proceedings in bankruptcy during the period since 1867 extended over the States of Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee, and amounted to over $3,000,000.

Again the committee said:

Norton made an arrangement with the auctioneers who made sales of bankrupt property, by virtue of which a division of the fees and charges of the auctioneers was made between them and Norton. Out of this Norton received, as is shown, more than $20,000.

These facts, while they indicate a state of most extraordinary administration in the office of assignee in bankruptcy, your committee could not trace directly to the knowledge of Judge Durell, although some testimony was given tending to show such knowledge.

All through this report of the committee are statements far more damaging than the one that I have just read. I will not stop to read them now, but will insert some of them in my remarks. Here are some extracts from the report.

Mr. Sanger was attorney of the creditors of Davis & Jackson, adjudged to be bankrupts. He proposed to have trustees elected under the law. In this connection he testified as follows, after stating that he had a power of attorney from Davis & Jackson:

Under that power of attorney I went to New Orleans, taking with me a power of attorney from Mr. Smith to act for him. Mr. Ellis also went to New Orleans. I had a power of attorney from all the creditors to vote, and also powers of attorney from Mr. Catlin and Mr. Levenson, two of the trustees, to represent them in any matters where it might be necessary. When I got to New Orleans and attended court on the day appointed for the meeting of creditors, presuming that everything was all right, I proceeded to vote for trustees, when I was stopped by Mr. Hughes.

I asked him what the matter was now. Said he, "You gentlemen have seen fit to take some action in this matter, but as I represent Mr Norton, I do not intend to have this meeting go on without his consent. You can not take these proceedings out of our hands in that way?" I said I thought the whole matter was arranged, that Mr. Ellis had told us that it was all right and that Mr. Ellis was there; but in fact Ellis had not come to that meeting; he had kept away, and the only one that appeared was Hughes. Hughes said no, that the meeting could not go on, because, in the first place, the commission had not been returned from New York. I said that thing was abandoned. "In the second place," said he, "Mr. Norton has not given his consent, and he is the custodian of the property here, and he will not give his consent," and the meeting was adjourned with no day fixed for it. Mr. Ellis had met me at Cincinnati, and had traveled from there to New Orleans with me, and had given me the assurance that everything was all right. I hunted him up, and asked him what this meant. He said he did not know exactly, but he supposed it was all right. I then went to Hughes and asked him what it meant. He said that meeting could not go on in that way. I said, "Did you see that we have agreed to pay certain expenses; if we can not agree to that we will leave it to the judge." "No," said he, "our fees must be settled first; settle our fees and you can go and elect your trustees."

I asked him what guaranty I would have that if we settled the fees, trustees could be elected. Says he, "You arrange the fees, and I will see that your trustees are elected, and that they are ratified;" and then he told me to go and see Norton. I went to see Norton, and from there to Cotton & Levy, and back again, and all around trying to make some compromise, and eventually I went to see Norton at the request of Cotton & Levy. Norton said this thing could be arranged; all I had to do, he said, was to pay his counsel and they would arrange what his compensation was to be. We came together, Cotton & Levy, and Billings & Hughes, and myself. I was sitting here, as it were, and Norton sat a little way behind me. I said, "Gentlemen, now what do you want; what am I to pay in order to have this meeting go on and my trustees elected?" Then they commenced to figure, Mr. Cotton and Mr. Hughes. They conferred together a little while, and then said to me, "I will tell you what we will do; you pay all the expenses that have been incurred by both Mr. Norton and Mr. Ellis, and pay them a reasonable compensation for their trouble, and pay us, and you shall have your trustees elected."

I asked them to state the amounts. Then they stated the amounts as follows: E. E. Norton, custodian in New Orleans, was to get some $6,500, and, in addition, disbursements, which they represented amounted to $4,201.69. Mr. Ellis, custodian, was to get a like sum of $6,500, and, in addition, disbursements in bankruptcy proceedings, amounting to $850. Cotton & Levy, Ellis's lawyers, and Billings & Hughes, Norton's lawyers, were to get each the sum of $5,500. That made nearly $30,000; and all the money they had there was $42,000. It was arranged that this money should be kept by them out of the fund that was in bank, and that they were to give me a check for the balance. I thought this was pretty steep. I telegraphed to New York that the best I could do was to pay about $30,000, and then I could get the estate out of their hands. They telegraphed me from New York that I should not do it; that it was too large; that I should try $20,000. Well, I could not move them, and that is what it remained at, $25,000 in fees and about $5,000 in expenses, making altogether $30,000, and I was coerced into that settlement, and subsequently agreed to it, and agreed to the entry of an order, and Mr. Hughes and Mr. Norton said to me afterward, when I again stated my doubts about having my voting ratified, should I vote for these gentlemen as trustees, "Don't you bother yourself about that; just consent to the fees being paid, and we will have the order."

It was about 4 o'clock in the afternoon when I drew up my consent to that effect, and Mr. Hughes drew this order which set forth the fact that the proper parties, who were authorized to make this compromise, had agreed upon certain specific amounts to be paid each person consenting to the issuing of this order. At 4 o'clock Mr. Hughes took this order away with him, and he brought it back signed by Judge Durell, as well as all the papers that I had signed electing these gentlemen as trustees. I carried out the resolution electing Catlin, and Ellis, and Levenson trustees, and Charles H. Smith and A. L. Sanger, and Carhart the committee, under whose direction the trustees should act. I drew up all the papers providing for the election of trustees and gave them to Mr. Hughes, and he took them and the order to Judge Durell, and they were all signed. The next morning, instead of giving the check (which was for about $13,000, the balance left) to me, they made it payable to the order of the trustees. They gave Ellis a check for his fees, which had been fixed by this order at $6,500, with some $850 disbursements; and then gave him a check for the balance, some $13,000, which stood to the credit of the creditors. The check was payable to the order of the three trustees, and Ellis took it and brought it to New York, or got a draft on New York for it. The other check was made payable to his own order.

By Mr. ELDREDGE:

Q. Were there any items presented in any of those accounts to be paid to those individuals, or was it a gross sum?

A. The amount for services was a gross sum stated in the lump, just as I have stated it, without any items. There was an item of disbursements of some $4,000, which was made up of separate items. Mr. Norton handed me the ledger, and the disbursements were apparently very little, except what were represented to be for engrossing orders. Part of these were for auctioneers' fees. I did not inquire into the legitimacy of the fees, nor whether they were a proper compensation.

Q. What had been done by the "custodian" in New Orleans, except to sell these $42,000 worth of goods?

A. Nothing at all.

Q. Was this $42,000 the net sum that the goods brought?

A. That was net.

Q. Do you know what the goods sold for in gross?

Q. They sold for more than that, and my impression now is that the auctioneers deducted their commissions first, and Norton deposited the balance in the Bank of Louisiana.

Had these facts been communicated by a less authoritative source than committees of the House of Representatives the world would not believe them, they are so infamous. In Mississipppi there was a court presided over by a judge who was regarded as proverbially honest. He never got any benefit from these bankruptcy proceedings and he never got drunk. But the bankrupt estates were managed with extravagance, such as 10 per cent for attorneys' fees and the like—amounting in one estate to $7,000. I have not been able to find anyone conversant with the facts who will say that in any bankruptcy court litigation was conducted fairly as in other cases. Loose practices seem to be indigenous to bankruptcy courts.

Another cause for putting a debtor in bankruptcy is:

Suffered, while insolvent, an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such execution shall be paid before a petition is filed.

This clause of the bill puts in the power of a sheriff or marshal, as the case may be, to put a solvent man in bankruptcy or provide the cause, without his knowledge or his fault. If a sheriff wanted to revenge himself, or was too indolent or careless to look for property, he would return the execution nulla bona. This bill does not even require him to call on the debtor to show property.

As I said of another case, he may have been sued jointly with another man for whom he was security, although joint maker, and depended on the other man to pay it, and gone from the State or from the county on business for thirty days and knows nothing of the execution, never expecting to pay the debt. Very many such hardships might be enumerated. No matter that he might return the next day after petition filed, with plenty of money to pay the debt, by this bill he is a bankrupt, and if he owes $5,000 debts and has $40,000 worth of property he can be forced to make out his schedule of all his debts and all his property and bring it into court.

This is no accident. The bill was drawn by a shrewd lawyer, and it is full of such traps and pitfalls.

Here is still another act of bankruptcy:

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

Now, I wish with all the earnestness of which I am capable to appeal to this House, and especially to the gentleman from Louisiana, who is my neighbor, not to perpetrate this act upon my people.

Mr. BOATNER. I will say to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing, and in fact I advocate, that that provision be stricken from the bill. I never defended it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have heard expressions of that kind from friends of this bill again and again. Whenever objection is made to obnoxious provisions they are willing to strike it out. I do not know what our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the gentleman in charge of this defense [Mr. BAILEY], or the handsome gentleman sitting in front of me [Mr. KILGORE] may ultimately do in this matter; but so far as I am concerned, if these gentlemen who so ably conduct the contention for this bill, will consent to an amendment, which ought in conscience and good faith to be made, striking out the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy, then I am ready to take my seat now and say no more. I am not opposed to a voluntary bankrupt law. My objections are to the unjust and cruel drastic provisions of the involuntary features of this measure.

Those provisions ought to be stricken out. Every once and a while when various provisions of this bill are shown up in their native deformity and crookedness and oppression, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will say, "You can strike that out." God knows these provisions ought to be stricken out; they never ought to have put their ugly visage in this measure.

But suppose these provisions are stricken out in the House, what have we been taught by the history of other measures in this House? When I first came to Congress, I thought I had become associated with the cleverest set of gentlemen I had ever seen. When I offered an amendment they would say, "All right; we will accept that amendment, and allow it to pass." But afterward the bill would go into conference, would come back into the House without the amendment.

Mr. STOCKDALE. And so I would have to bid good bye to my amendment. Now, when we come to have a conference with the Senate on this bill the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will be on the committee, probably the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], and one Republican member who may be in favor of the bill as it is. The Senate committee will stand in about the same way. The committee of conference will come in here and will present their report, move to concur in the conference report, and move the previous question; the Speaker will put the question. Gentlemen may say they are willing to consent to this or the other amendment, but Mr. Torrey will not consent to them, and he is the "boss" of this concern. [Laughter.]

Under this bill you can not put a farmer into bankruptcy nor a national bank. Is not this the strangest pair of twins that ever was seen. The lion and the lambare about to lie down together—the United States banks and the farmers! I doubt whether the farmers will like the company. The legislation of this country has already well-nigh bankrupted the farmers, and if we do not do something for their relief soon it will be little use to exempt them, for they will have nothing.

But what is the effect of this bill on the farmer? In the South money is realized almost entirely from the cotton and sugar crops. They mature about the same time. Money comes in to the merchant once a year. During the summer merchants advance supplies to the planters, as well as men who float logs to market. To secure these merchants who give them credit, the farmers are obliged to give a mortgage on their homesteads. In an ordinary proceeding for debt the creditor can not take the homestead or such property as is exempted by law.

But these farmers have been compelled under the oppressive legislation of this Government to mortgage their homesteads, to mortgage their exempt property. The merchant is trying to carry the farmer through. But he has given his note for supplies in New Orleans or St. Louis. Here comes the creditor who desires to be preferred and says, "You pay me or secure me in full or I will put you into bankruptcy within thirty days, for I have your commercial paper." What is a merchant going to do under such circumstances? The debtor may be perfectly solvent if you will let him go until the cotton crop comes in; he will then be able to pay every dollar he owes; but he can not do it in midsummer, and he is thrust into bankruptcy. What then? Why, the mortgage which the farmer has given on his homestead and on his exempt property goes into the hands of a trustee. It is converted; and he is turned out of his home and loses his crop which he has toiled early and late to make thus far, and creditors, by putting one merchant in bankruptcy, may get fifty farms for a song and make the owners tenants, because this trouble comes at a time when he or they can raise no money.

Thus to people of the poorer classes a measure of this kind would operate as absolute confiscation. I appeal to gentlemen from the wealthier parts of this country who do not need the passage of a bill of this kind—gentlemen whose constituents have plenty of money. I say to them it is not necessary to ruin our people in this summary, oppressive, and unjust way.

Now, I want to call attention to another unique feature of this measure. Let us see for what offenses a debtor may be imprisoned for two years by the action of the United States court; and imprisonment by such tribunals means either imprisonment in the penitentiary or in the county jail, as the court may determine. Here is a definition of one of the offenses:

Made a substantially false valuation, as a bankrupt, of any of the property of his estate in his schedule of property, or omitted therefrom any of the property of his estate, or from the list of his creditors any person to whom he is indebted in a substantial amount, or included therein any person to whom he is not indebted or included therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebtedness.

If the debtor happens to include in the list as a creditor a man to whom he is not indebted, he is imprisoned two years. He may think he owes him. They may have had mutual running accounts and he thinks he is indebted a considerable sum, but if it turns out that he is mistaken he goes to prison for two years. There is no provision that "if he willfully does it," but simply if he does it.

On the other hand, if he omits a creditor by accident or mistake, or refuses to acknowledge a debt that he does not owe or believes he does not owe, if the court should hold that he did, he may be imprisoned for two years. The man who is charged with a debt that he disputes, will be in a dilemma. However unjust or corrupt the decision of the court may be, he goes to prison if it is adverse to his report. This was no oversight. The bill shows careful and cunning study from its initial to its final letter. These gentlemen may be willing to insert the word "willfully" here, but the author of the bill has not put it in, and he never intended to. He intended to hold this in terrorem over the creditors. The bankrupt may say that he does not owe the debt justly; that it is an unfounded claim. There is no provision for that. There may be an honest difference as to the amount of the claim, or he may believe that he has paid the debt; but no matter what the circumstances, if a mistake is made he goes to prison. It is not provided, as in all other penal statutes, that if these things "be willfully" or "corruptly" done.

I say that that is the intention of the bill. It was framed by a learned lawyer, and he is a fine lawyer. He is not only a good lawyer, but is a man of shrewd intellect and extensive information, and he has prepared barbs and put them all over this bill to catch and tear the unfortunate debtors of the country.

The eleventh act for which imprisonment will be inflicted—

(11) Transferred, otherwise than in the ordinary course of his business, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, any property which he has obtained on credit.

Suppose a merchant had purchased goods on credit and such a panic as is now upon us overtakes him and he has not sold them and can not sell them. Any honest man would give them back to the seller on demand, and especially if he contemplated bankruptcy; but that would not be "in the ordinary course of his business" for a retail merchant to sell to a wholesale merchant, and he would go to prison for two years under this bill for that honest act, which if he did not do he would be denounced as dishonest.

Suppose a merchant both solvent and honest shapes his business prudently with the lights before him in the spring, and agrees to furnish a certain number of customers, but to his surprise about July when the crop is nearly made and promises well, a panic overtakes him. Perhaps his money is in a national bank and he can not get it. He sees he can not get through and that his failure will greatly distress his customers. He applies to a friend, who has never made a dollar out of him, for a loan of money, and gets it without interest, both thinking that an extra session of Congress will relieve the hard times. He buys supplies with that money and sells to his customers to carry them through and enable them to finish their crops, and takes their notes secured for these same supplies that he bought with that borrowed money—and cotton or sugar is low, or cut short by drought or flood—and he fears he can not pay all his debts that fall, and transfers these same notes to repay that money, it would be an act of bankruptcy under this bill—sixth clause—and if his business failed to such an extent that he contemplated being put in bankruptcy he would be imprisoned for that act under this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we say that is pretty hard. It is entirely contrary to all the criminal jurisprudence of the country. There is nothing like it in the common law that has been handed down to us as the perfection of wisdom and justice. Whether any civilized country has ever adopted such a statute or not I do not know. It is too harsh, too unjustifiable for this country and people.

Now, we will go over to the next page and see how leniently this bill treats the other people who are to be chosen to enforce this iniquity and who may be as corrupt as Hades—I believe that is the parliamentary term now.

A MEMBER. Sheol.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Well, Hades or sheol, either of them will do; in fact the old Anglo-Saxon word would satisfy me when I am talking about this bill. [Laughter.] Let us see what it says:

First. A person shall be punished by fine, not to exceed $100, upon conviction of the offense of having willfully acted as a referee in a case in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

Mr. BOATNER. That is, the lawyers.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Oh, no; the lawyers do not act as referees. They can do better, especially those of them who live about the bankruptcy courts.

I do not know how I would do myself if I was down there, but I am now representing the people. [Laughter.] It would be better for the country's credit and for the interest of creditors if lawyers would act as referees and trustees. They have a professional pride that prevents the ridiculous practices that seem to be inevitable to bankrupt courts.

2. Neglected while an officer to furnish in writing and transmit by mail information such as is within his knowledge, or as may be shown by the records and papers in his possession, to the Attorney-General for statistical purposes within thirty days after being requested by him to do so.

Now, here is a very important feature of this bill, upon which depends the integrity of its execution. The Attorney-General may overlook this officer of the United States Government; but if he fails to make an accurate report of the records and papers in his possession, what is the consequence? He is not sent to jail or to the penitentiary for two years. Oh, no! The poor debtor may go to the jail for two years if John Smith claims $100 and the debtor claims that he owes him only $50 or nothing at all. If it should turn out that he did owe it, or if the bankrupt court should so decide, whether correctly or not, he goes to the jail or to the penitentiary for two years for insisting upon his rights.

But if a man takes a thousand dollars while an officer and fails to report it to the Attorney-General—and he may go through his court here as infamously as Norton did and get away with $10,000, or any amount of dollars of the estate—his punishment is a fine of $100. They might be amenable to the criminal law; but who ever heard of such a prosecution? What is the difference between Norton and those people who will execute this law in some places throughout the country? And Norton and his accomplices were not prosecuted, notwithstanding their extortions, such as taking $30,000 fees out of a $42,000 fund. Besides, it is the animus of this bill I am discussing, aiming to wreak vengeance of two years' imprisonment on a debtor for a mistake, and only $100 fine on officers of the court for a willful and corrupt violation of duty.

Again:

If he neglect for thirty days, while a referee or trustee, to furnish such reasonable information concerning an estate in process of administration before him, or of which he is trustee, as may be requested by parties in interest.

The trustee, a sworn officer of the court, into whose hands the assets are placed and who has to administer them and sell the estate and account for the funds, if he fails in his duty—and he is supposed to be an intelligent man—if he fails and acts corruptly, why he pays this fine of $100.

But the man who happens to make a mistake between John Smith for $50 goes to jail for two years. I suppose these gentlemen would not mean any such injustice. I would not make any such intimation; but it shows that this bill has not been closely scanned, has not been critically examined, for I know these gentlemen do not tolerate any such injustice as that.

Again:

Or practiced while a referee as an attorney, a counselor at law, solicitor in equity, or proctor in admiralty, in any bankruptcy proceeding.

The debtor would not know any better possibly, than to violate the law, and yet he is imprisoned for two years; but the lawyer who is presumed to know the law and willfully violates it pays $100. He could well afford to do it if he could make a few thousand dollars by the operation.

Who can read these two parts of this bill and not see that the former is intended by its author to handle debtors with severity, even with cruelty, while the latter invites the people who may be chosen for their qualifications to perpetrate the outrages upon the rights of citizens to rigorous persecution of debtors by receiving in advance virtual immunity from liability for crime.

I will insert here paragraph b of section 8 and all of section 9 of this bill, and submit them without comment to civilized people:

b. The judge may, at any time after the filing of a petition by or against a person and before the expiration of six months after he has been adjudged a bankrupt, upon affidavit of any party in interest that such bankrupt is about to leave the district and that his departure will defeat the proceedings therein, issue a warrant to the marshal directing him to bring such bankrupt forthwith before the court; if upon hearing the evidence it shall appear to the judge that the allegations of such affidavit are true and that it is necessary, he shall order such marshal to keep such bankrupt in custody, but not imprison him, until he shall be released or give bail conditioned for his appearance from time to time, as required by the court, and for his obedience to all lawful orders.

SEC. 9. a Extradition of bankrupts.—Whenever a warrant for the apprehension of a bankrupt shall have been issued, and he shall have been found within the jurisdiction of a court other than the one issuing the warrant, he may be extradited in the same manner in which persons under indictment are now extradited from one district, within which a district court has jurisdiction, to another.

Another offense—

Purchased while a referee directly or indirectly any property of an estate in bankruptcy.

That would be a very corrupt act. He having judicial powers, and if permitted to do it, a corrupt man would enter corrupt orders and profit by them; and yet the only barrier interposed by this bill to such acts is a fine of $100. How lenient it is to corrupt officials and how cruel to unfortunate debtors. Oh, this is a terrible bill.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-one minutes.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Now, here is the way in which this bill makes a referee a part of the court:

The referee shall certify the facts.

That is, if anybody "cuts up" before the referee, sitting on a log somewhere or at a country schoolhouse, if any man does anything unbecoming to the dignity of that referee, then—

The referee shall certify the facts to the judge, if any person shall do any of the things forbidden in this section. The judge shall thereupon, in a summary manner, hear the evidence as to the acts complained of and, if it is such as to warrant him in so doing, punish such person in the same manner and to the same extent as for a contempt committed before the court of bankruptcy or commit such person upon the same conditions as if the doing of the forbidden act had occurred with reference to the process of or in the presence of the court.

Who ever heard of such a provision as that? A referee, picked up in every county, selected for political services, perhaps; some fellow who does not know what a lawyer or a party to a suit can do or can not do before a court; may be taken hundreds of miles to Jackson, in my State, or to New Orleans, or Alexandria, or Baton Rouge, in Louisiana. In Texas he might have to go as far as across New England to answer for contempt of a referee, and the petitioner would be put upon his proof to show that the creditors were fewer than twelve. They might put him upon the stand and examine him, but under this bill, if that is alleged, the debtor must come in and file his schedule, and show to the court just whom he owes, where the creditors live and what amount, and even then, if he happens to say he owes a man $175 when he owes him $150, he goes to jail, and if he owes $150 and says that he owes $125, then he goes to jail.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. How does that provision hurt him if he is solvent?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I am surprised that a man of the intelligence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] should ask that question, unless he is like some of the balance of these people, and have an absolute contempt for a poor man or debtor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Oh, no; I am a poor man myself.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Well, you have no business in New York, then. Your constituents never knew that fact or they would not have sent you to Congress. [Laughter.] Just wait until the tariff bill comes in, if it contains a schedule to tax incomes, and my friend from New York will make eloquent appeals to the House not to form an inquisition into a man's business.

How does it hurt him if he is solvent? Take a solvent man up when he is going on with his business, moving quietly and well, some creditor comes upon him with a conscience seared over with long practice in such methods and alleges that a debtor's creditors are fewer than twelve; instead of you giving him such an opportunity as any other man would have to try his cause, he is forced into court and must show up his whole business, in midsummer in my country, when there is no money in the country (and there is none anywhere else now, so far as that is concerned), and he must show his whole business; he must stop his business and go on and make a contest with this creditor and pay lawyers and incur expenses to disprove a mere allegation.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. All he has got to do is to deny it, and then the lawyer must prove his case.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is just where you show you do not know anything about the bill. [Laughter.] I said that at the beginning; that if gentlemen would read this bill they would not support it. If you will read this bill you will find you are mistaken.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I am not supporting this bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I am glad to hear you say that.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. It is a general rule that if a man makes a complaint the other party may deny, and then issue is joined.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is justice; that is right; but that is not this bill.

Mr. WEVER. That is right.

Mr. STOCKDALE. He must go into court and show a schedule of his debts and creditors before he can deny it successfully.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I am not quite sure you are right about that.

Mr. STOCKDALE. And that would ruin his credit, if he had any. It would strike anybody that way who knows anything of just legal proceedings. I do not wonder that you doubt the accuracy of my statement. I do not wonder that you or any honest lawyer are startled at the statement, for such a thing is unknown in the jurisprudence of the Anglo-Saxons. If he were to be put upon his proof it would be all right; but this bill evades intentionally that principle, because it was drawn by one of the most astute lawyers in this country.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I agree with you about that.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I will settle the question as to whether I am right by reading from the bill.

If it be averred in the petition that the creditors of the bankrupt are less than twelve in number, and less than three creditors have joined as petitioners therein—

Now listen here—

and the answer avers the existence of a larger number of creditors, there shall be filed with the answer a list under oath of all the creditors, with their addresses and several amounts due to them, and thereupon the court shall cause all such creditors to be notified of the pendency of such petition and shall delay the hearing upon such petition for a reasonable time—to the end that parties in interest shall have an opportunity to be heard.

For what?

No respect is paid to the man whose business has been thus rudely broken upon. But the court will delay until creditors can leasurely examine him.

You may delay it as long as you please; you have the debtor in your clutches. Here is a man perfectly solvent, brought in by a false oath, or no oath, and compelled to show up his whole business. If he is not insolvent make him so by this means, destroy his credit and turn him loose, and the man who works all this ruin without even the consent of a single other creditor incurs no liability, is not even required to give a bond to answer in damages to the injured man.

What superior claims have the creditor class upon the Government that Congress shall disgrace itself by reversing the rules of evidence of an hundred years' standing in order to give them an unfair advantage in the courts?

The proposition that this Government shall require its courts to force its citizens to parade a full schedule of their business before the court under oath at the behest of one creditor and notify all the others to come and behold it, and thus ruin his business and credit, then turn him loose with a sneer—only a poor devil of a debtor, anyhow—evinces to my mind a degree of insolence in the wealthy classes that I never expected to see in America. I know of no epithet sufficiently vigorous to name it, and much less did I ever expect to see an American Congress willing to aid them in such a scheme. I do not believe it will; patriotic men will not vote for it.

I venture the prediction that when the vote on this measure shall have been taken and recorded, it will present a rare anomaly. Framed and urged professedly in the interests and for the relief of debtors, it is opposed by representatives of the debtor classes and championed by the creditor classes. This is evidence that it is a scheme, a fraud, a snare, and upon its own face are branded evidences of tyranny and oppression and a jeering contempt for the rights as well as the liberties of American citizens and for the pride of the race.

Mr. Chairman, a tariff bill will be in here presently. Possibly it may contain among its provisions one imposing a tax on incomes in some form. If so, judging from the past, many gentlemen on this floor who represent constituencies among whom banks, insurance companies, trust companies, and great aggregations of wealth flourish, will swell to the danger line with indignation at the idea of a Government officer being authorized to look into their business. "It is inquisitorial" they will say. I suggest to those who expect to say that then, to withhold a vote for this measure, which not only allows a revengeful creditor to examine a man's business, but to require the man himself to spread a full sworn schedule before the world on the records of the bankrupt court in order to prove himself not insolvent. He may be so held for months and then a creditor who did not gain in the prosecution may put him in bankruptcy for nonpayment of his commercial paper in thirty days while he was in that fix. In the South three-fourths of the merchants could be forced into bankruptcy under this bill if it becomes a law and widespread disaster be visited on the farmers and timber men, while if let alone until the cotton and sugar crops are marketed and the rains fall to float logs they would be perfectly solvent. I say to these gentlemen "If you persist in voting for this bill you ought to preserve a decorous and decent silence when the income tax presents itself."

This bill would allure and deceive the farmers of the country in excepting them from the operation of the involuntary clause. Knowing, as the advocates of this bill must know, that the farming population who are in debt—that is, the majority of them—are many of them indebted, as I have said, to people whom this bill would ruin, and then their claims against the farmers would go into the bankrupt court as assets and they, too, be ruined, however solvent they may be, because they can not pay in spring or midsummer.

Just at this time there are but few institutions of industry that could stand the operation of that part of the bill. The national banks themselves could not stand it to-day, and therefore they are exempted.

The United States national banks are the most dangerous institutions of the country, and are doing much to destroy the confidence of the people in the integrity of the Government. Their mismanagement well-nigh ruined the prosperity of the country in 1890, and would have precipitated a panic but for the timely rescue by the Secretary of the Treasury with $70,000,000 of Government money.

Mr. OATES. Does my friend want to put the national banks into the bill by an amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. I am pointing out objections.

Mr. OATES. I wish my friend would answer the question.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do, if this unholy thing is to pass at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. OATES. Have you ever offered any amendment to include them in the bill?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Thank God, I am not the father of this bill, and I do not believe it can be perfected. [Laughter.] You may give it some hypodermic injections, but you can not cure it. You can not restore to soundness decayed fruit. You can not restore to health and vigor a body already permeated with blood-poison, and I look upon this bill as that sort of a thing. It is hereditarily unsound. It fits in well as a part of the great movement now sweeping over this country to subjugate the debtor and poorer classes to the domination and service of the rich classes. It is intended to take away from our people their property in these hard times and leave them without power to resist usurpation.

The past legislation of this country has made it so that every man will tell you that there is no money to be had either among the farming population or the business men. Who will stand up here and say that there is plenty of money in his town or in his district? If anyone does say that, I will show him the men that are holding the money which belongs to other people, and who can not pay it or will not pay it, and those men, it appears from this bill, must not be put into bankruptcy! Those banks now have got $1,600,000,000 of the people's money that they will not pay, and yet a poor devil of a debtor must be collared and made to pay at once.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman please tell us right there how the banks have got sixteen hundred millions? That is the whole of the circulation in this country. Have those banks got it all?

Mr. STOCKDALE. The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed that they had two billion and twenty millions of deposits. It was stated on the floor by some of the best informed men in this House, late in the debate, that they had still seventeen hundred millions of deposits, and they have paid out very little since that time, I think.

Mr. OATES. Do you not know that they have not got that amount in money in the banks?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes, I do know it; and I am glad the gentleman asked that question. Where is the money? Why, they have loaned it out on speculation. They receive the money from the people on deposit, knowing that the owners of it desire to put it away as a provision against a rainy day, against hard times, against such times as we have now, and, with full knowledge of that fact, they have loaned it out for sixty days, or ninety days, or for six months, or for twelve months, so that the depositors are unable to get their money when they want it, and the cash assets of the banks will not sell for 50 cents on the dollar. So that the poor people are swindled, and all the satisfaction they can get is to be told, "Just wait until confidence is restored."

Confidence in whom and by whom? The bankers have confidence now in the depositors. They ought to have, as they have got the depositors' money. [Laughter.] But when the depositor comes and asks for his money, the banker says, "You must have confidence in me; leave your money here with me; it will be all right." I tell you that when a man deposits his money with you as a provision against sickness, or want of work, or distress, and when sickness or want of work or distress comes and he asks for his money and you fail to give it to him, you will get his confidence again only when you pay him that money, and no sooner, and not for some time after that, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. But when the banker can not pay, then he becomes one of these "poor debtors" that the gentleman talks so much about.

Mr. STOCKDALE. No, you can not put him into bankruptcy. He gets your money and keeps it and does not become poor, and this law exempts him. Under this bill men may be driven into bankruptcy because they can not get their money out of the banks, yet the banks are excepted and the debtor ruined for want of the money.

Mr. BOATNER. Does not the gentleman know that under the law as it exists the doors of any national bank can be shut any day when the Comptroller directs?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Yes, the gentleman knows that, and the gentleman from Louisiana is not giving him any information, but it is not done.

Mr. BAILEY. But he knows, also, that that law has not been enforced.

Mr. BOATNER. Has any man ever asked in the regular manner to have a bank closed that was not closed? Does the gentleman know of a case?

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman from Louisiana knows, and I know, that in the Senate an attempt was made to adopt resolutions to inquire whether the United States banks were not violating the law, and that no such resolution could pass immediately, although the Senators, men of integrity and ability, too much so to prevaricate, too much so to dodge, said that everybody knew the banks were violating the law, or words to that effect.

Mr. OATES. I do not wish at this time to go into the question of the conduct of the banks. I am not their friend. I do not propose to go into a discussion with the gentleman upon that subject, or to controvert what he may say about them. I am waiting for him to tell me how the banks have $1,700,000,000 on deposit, when the whole circulation is only $1,600,000,000.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have told you that by the last report they had two billion and twenty millions.

Mr. SIBLEY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the same money can be deposited over and over again, so that one million may count as five millions, or as ten millions.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I hope that is not the question of the gentleman from Alabama. He knows how it is done.

Mr. OATES. That is the very question.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] is a banker and I go to him and deposit a hundred dollars; he gives me a certificate of deposit; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] borrows that hundred dollars. He does not borrow it to lay away, but to spend it to pay a debt with. He pays a debt, we will suppose to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN], who goes to the bank and deposits that same $100 with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and gets a certificate of deposit. There are two certificates of deposit for $100 each; yet there is only $100 in the bank to pay them with; but he holds your note, and your note in these times may not be worth 50 cents on the dollar; scarcely anybody's note is. [Laughter.] In addition to that there is almost as much deposited in the savings banks and State banks as in the national banks.

Now, let me say one word more. If this statement is not true I am not making it without high authority; it is the Secretary of the Treasury who has made it. I quote from him.

Mr. OATES. I am aware of that; and I am aware how the accounts are made; but my friend made a broad assertion that there was a certain amount on deposit in the national banks. The fact is the accounts show that amount, but it is not in actual money.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But there was that amount deposited in the national banks; and as I was about to say when I was interrupted, they had loaned out that amount or invested it in speculation in a manner which I say was wrongful and criminal. When the Senate of the United States was asked to investigate whether wrongful proceedings in violation of the law had been carried on by the banks, Senators said, "Of course everybody knows they have been violating the law; but we can not afford to hold them to account now; they are United States banks." That, I say, shows the unfairness of this bill. I have not time now, but will verify what I say by adding the proof to my remarks in the RECORD.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended.

A MEMBER. Indefinitely.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Oh, no; I do not ask that; I know the time is limited.

Mr. BAILEY. I make this suggestion to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]: It will not be possible for him or for me to proceed with our remarks this evening; and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be permitted to proceed further.

Mr. OATES objected.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that if this arrangement is not consented to, the committee will simply rise and the House adjourn, and we thus lose the time. I would be willing to give the gentleman from Mississippi a portion of my time, but I have already promised it.

Mr. OATES. I yielded to the gentleman from Texas four hours out of the six hours and a half, and I can not yield further.

Mr. BOATNER. Let the time be extended twenty minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. OATES. The House can do as it pleases in regard to that matter.

Mr. BOATNER. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended twenty minutes by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OUTHWAITE). The time for this debate has been limited by the House, and the motion of the gentleman can not be entertained.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that by unanimous consent it can be done. I believe that, as a matter of fact, under our present rules, the Committee of the Whole itself can limit debate.

The CHAIRMAN. But the time for this debate has already been limited by action of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. But the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is for unanimous consent. Does the Chair decline to entertain the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to entertain it. The Chair thinks the proposition is not in order, the House having limited the debate.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] twenty minutes, and I will confine my remarks to forty minutes.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not want the gentleman to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Mississippi resumes, the Chair will have read a paragraph from the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

Debate having been closed at a particular hour by order of the House, it is not competent for the committee even by unanimous consent to extend the time.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that to have been the rule when the Committee of the Whole had no power over the course of the debate; but under our present rules—I have not examined them since the present session began, but I have understood that the former rule has been amended and that now the Committee of the Whole can itself limit the debate. I make no point on this matter, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, as the Chair understands, yields twenty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE].

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I am surprised at the gentleman from Alabama. When they were speaking on that side, his colleague on the committee, Gen. WOLVERTON, I think spoke for about four hours. But we see the position that we are placed in.

Mr. OATES. I desire to correct my friend from Mississippi. I spoke but one hour.

Mr. BAILEY. He said Mr. WOLVERTON.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman from Alabama, at all events, was careful to have plenty of time for himself.

Mr. OATES. That is always a very good arrangement.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Well, yes; it is just about in keeping with this bill. It will not bear discussion. I do not wonder he does not want to see this bill held up in all of its nakedness. I do not wonder that he refused an extension to expose an utterly defenseless measure.

Mr. OATES. Why, I offered the gentleman ten minutes of my own time and Mr. BAILEY would not accept it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I take back what I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. I did not decline it; I had no right to do so. I simply said that I would yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi. The gentleman ought to make his statement as straight as we want to make his bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Now, Mr. Chairman, a word further, for I do not wish to consume the time which has been so graciously accorded to me. This bill is not intended to discharge anybody. I have not time to read that feature of the bill; but you will find when you examine it that it does not intend to discharge a man from his debt when he is put into bankruptcy, voluntarily or involuntarily either, because it makes fraudulent an act which is perfectly legal under the State laws.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. What is that?

Mr. STOCKDALE (continuing). And if he acts fraudulently, according to the terms of the bill he can not be discharged. It is a scheme to trap the unwary. Just read the various causes here which will prevent him from securing a discharge and you will find that though honest and solvent at the same time a man may be put into bankruptcy and never be discharged if his creditors do not want it; and even under the bankruptcy proceedings within two years, whatever earnings he may have made in that time the proceedings can be opened up again by his creditor if he so desires and come in and take all of his property, and even then not discharge him. In answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS], it is the fourth cause—in other words, "made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors"—which is legal in all the States.

This measure is purely a creditors' bill. Debtors are not demanding it.

I will venture the assertion that not all the members in this House can show forty letters from debtors that want to be discharged. It is by the creditors that this bill is supported; and you wait until you hear the vote upon it and you will find the representatives of the creditor classes largely in the majority. I never saw such a set of benign creditors before in all my existence. They want to discharge the poor man from his debt when he does not ask it! Our people do not want to get rid of their debts in that way. They do not want the cloud of being a bankrupt hanging over them and the story told to their children. Give them a half chance and they will pay every cent they owe. But here is the creditor class with the stringent machinery of this bill taking the people by the throat and forcing them into an attitude that they do not wish to occupy, and I have heard nothing but expressions of contempt for the debtors since the debate began.

Now, in conclusion, a single word. What is the present condition? The legislation of the Congress has failed—utterly failed to relieve the stringent money market of the country. The people are laboring under the same problems that have so long beset them. The President's message of August 8 informed us that every man has done his duty, that agriculture has been prosperous throughout the country, that no calamity of any kind exists, that no sickness, no epidemic has prevailed, that no state of war threatens us, but the money, the stringency of the money, was producing all the harm. The business men cried out, the bankers cried out for relief. We were summoned to the capital to give that relief.

We have been here for three months and have made it worse, and now without waiting to postpone this proposition to see how we can aid by letting the people have a chance to relieve the stringency itself by their own exertions, here we have a proposition pressed upon us to let the creditors take the people by the throat and say: "Now we have got you where we want you. We will take your property, destroy your business, and put it into the hands of our own agents, and reap the profits ourselves." This panic has been brewing like the brewing of a storm ever since 1890, when the Secretary of the Treasury tided it over that paroxysm. But the cause was deep in our system, and the elements kept on concentrating, and in this fateful year 1893 burst upon the country with destructive force. Financiers could see it and prepare themselves; did see it and did prepare for it. They unleashed a storm, but it soon accumulated into a cyclone and swept the country.

I will append some statistics to my remarks on this branch of the subject.

Mr. Chairman, no law should protect a debtor in dishonesty and no law should encourage a creditor in dishonesty, nor aid him by oppression and wrong to ruin an honest debtor simply because he is a debtor.

Men incurred debts while prosperity reigned throughout all the borders of this great country, buoyant with hopes of a great future and confidence in the patriotism of their chosen servants. Commissioned for a time to rule, they shaped their business prudently in the lights surrounding them. Now, without any fault of theirs, they have been plunged into misfortune, the greatest panic of the age is inflicted upon them, brought on by bad legislation and bad management of the banks fostered by the Government combining to reduce property and enhance obligations in value. And when distress is at its worst, when Congress by its own hand has produced largely this distress and utterly failed to furnish any relief. Having, I say, increased the value of debts in the hands of the creditor and reduced the value of the debtor's property and destroyed his ability to pay, and then hand him over, as this bill does, bound to be despoiled and have the name bankrupt branded on his frontlet, is a crown of thorns that no honest debtor should be made to wear by an honest government. Can the Congress afford to stand up before the country confessing its inability or unwillingness to remove this national financial distress that is pressing the spirit out of our people, many of whom are desolate amid plenty, hungry among abundance; and yet by such a law as this demand that debtors shall pay their debts at this moment or be branded as bankrupts?

Is there no softer voice in the American Government than the chink of gold? Is there no easier goad for our people than the lash of starvation? Have the American people and the American Congress no heart, no soul, no conscience higher and holier than the love of a dollar? Will they, after putting our people in this attitude, not waiting until even the latter part of the session to see if we can relieve the stringency of the times and restore the long lost confidence, and let money come out so that people can get it to pay their debts, will they vote for the passage of such a bill as this? The language of this bill is, "We will take you now, and take your property. That is what we want. We do not want business men. We want to drive out the little fellows and let the great firms do all the business of the country. We want your property. We want to make you tenants and slaves, and we will master the country."

Will Congress say it? The gentleman from Alabama has long been a member of this body, and is known over the nation. He is regarded in my State as a tribune of the people. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is willing to eliminate from this bill its harsh and cruel features, and I hope my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] will withdraw from its support the influence of his great name, and not exert his powers to the injury of our people, as I believe this measure to be. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

Under the leave granted I append the following:

In reference to the deposits and the action of the banks I submit the following extracts from a minority report, No. 163, from the Committee of the House on the Judiciary of the Fifty-second Congress:

The money status of the banks in December, 1890, was:

Specie	$190,063,006
Legal tender	82,117,126
United States certificates	5,760,000
Total	278,000,126

They had outstanding notes $123,038,785. Had these bills been secured only by the solvency of the banks, as in the old State bank issue, a run would have ensued on these notes as in 1837, 1857, 1861. Taking out that sum and leaving in banks $144,961,331, a run of depositors would have followed as before, closing the banks in a few days and wrecking again the industries of 62,000,000 people with an aggregate wealth of $70,000,000,000.

The banks owed depositors on the above date $1,485,095,885, and other items to the amount of nearly $500,000,000 more.

The United States Treasury came to the relief of the banks and put out over $70,000,000 in a few weeks. Secretary Windom said, in his last speech, had it not been for this help "the stringency would have resulted in widespread financial ruin."

The last report of the Comptroller of the Currency of December, 1891, vol. 1, pp. 154, 155, shows the total volume of money in all the national banks in the United States is—

Specie	$183,515,075
Legal tender	97,615,608
United States certificates	15,720,000
Total held	296,850,683
Reserve required by law	216,899,737
Available working cash	79,950,946

Suppose the United States Treasury, in 1890, had been in the condition that it is now, unable to furnish the relief of $70,000,000, a panic such as would have dwarfed all preceding panics would have blighted this country, and the depositors, who are generally people of moderate means, would have lost their money; for it is the history of the country that securities taken for loans of deposit money or other money, by banks, will not sell in times of panic, except at a great discount. The Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1892, page 214, shows that the assets of 181 insolvent national banks amounted to $108,633,185; of that sum were estimated as good, $45,046,031, as doubtful, $33,862,327, and as worthless, $29,724,823. These banks were liquidated in ordinary times; and then the same report shows that the loss on claims, compounded or sold by order of court, was $26,372,544. Had these banks been liquidated in times of panic the assets would have been practically worthless to creditors after the expenses were deducted.

The bank reserve of the United States banks, as shown by the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1892, pages 160, 161, are—

Specie	$209,116,379
Legal tenders	104,267,945
United States certificates	13,995,000
Total	327,379,324

Of that sum the reserve required by law to be always in the banks at that date is $252,177,675, leaving in the banks to meet emergencies $75,201,649.

The same report (page 160) shows that there is on deposit in the United States banks $2,022,479,824. In this condition of the banks suppose a scare should come (and it would come now if the depositors knew the condition of the banks) and a run by depositors should be made. The banks have $75,000,000 available cash to pay depositors, and doubtless have securities to the amount of deposits loaned out and denominated "cash assets" by banks and may make them available if no crisis comes; but such a scare as came in 1890, without assistance from the Treasury, would precipitate a run by depositors and a panic would follow such as this country has never seen.

The failure of a few great firms would precipitate it at any moment.

Amidst such a panic the cash assets of banks would not sell for 50 cents on the dollar—for a time would not sell at all. Men who owe them could not pay them for lack of money, and depositors would lose their deposits and suffering and distress follow, and general depression follow that. It has been said that the depreciation of stocks and property in New York alone amounted to $100,000,000, owing to the scare of 1890, and to fabulous sums throughout the United States. Such a panic as is now threatened on account of the faulty system of the currency would cause a depreciation of property in America that can not be estimated, but would surely reach to thousands of millions.

Here is the evidence of the Treasury Department of the Government in 1890 and 1892, and the prediction of that report as to what might be expected from such a condition, which is now more than verified. I call attention to the facts shown above, to wit: In December, 1890, the national banks had received deposits and owed depositors to the amount of $1,485,095,885. The banks knew then that they could not pay their deposits. They knew that a disastrous panic was averted then only by the Secretary of the Treasury with his $70,000,000. They knew that a crisis was approaching, but instead of preparing to pay depositors they still took people's money until, in 1892, they owed depositors $2,022,479,824, an increase of over five hundred millions, knowing they could not pay it.

I stated that the law was not enforced against them and Senators acknowledge it. I here append extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 24, 1893, page 458, et seq.:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate—

"First. Whether, and in what respect, the national banks, or any of them, in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia are being now conducted in violation of law.

"Second. Whether said banks are paying depositors' checks promptly in lawful money.

"Third. Whether said banks, or any of them, are demanding rates of interest higher than those provided by law for the loan of money or in discounting notes and bills."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEFFER. Is the motion to refer debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PEFFER. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon a reference of the resolution. It is a very important matter, and we ought to have the information immediately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the resolution of the Senator from Kansas be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I once heard President Grant say that the worst subordinate a military officer could have is one who always obeys orders. In a time of popular distress and panic it is utterly impossible to get along without the greatest trouble and suffering if every man and organization charged with a public function is compelled to drive everybody it has to deal with up to the strict letter of the law.

I understand that the President of the United States appointed a Comptroller of the Currency who had not been a banker, who had not been a speculator, who had not been a dealer in credits or exchanges of any kind. He took a man whom he believed, and believed on good evidence, was a clear-headed, capable man, able to deal, with energy, force, impartiality, and honesty, with any public subject upon which his faculties should be turned, and to discharge any responsibility that should be committed to him. As to whether the President was right in his estimate of that gentleman I have, of course, no personal means of pronouncing an opinion, but I suppose the Senate thought he was right because they confirmed him.

I understand he has not thought it best to bring everybody right up to the rack whenever any national bank in this country has failed to comply with the strict and extreme letter of the law in dealing with its customers, and has tried to get along and have the communities and business men supplied with credit as well as currency; and I think it would be well to wait a week or ten days and see what we are going to do about things in general before we go to poking into that question too much.

The Comptroller of the Currency is acting under the direction and the constant supervision of an eminent gentleman familiar with these subjects, lately a member of this body, who is acting under the direction and constant control of the legally constituted President of the United States. I do not believe it is well to pass this resolution just now. If the Committee on Finance look at it and by to-morrow morning or the next day say that it is not going to do any harm, or that there is not any more information they want to ask at the same time, they will report it back.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think it would be much safer to have the resolution printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, so as to let us see exactly what we are doing in these critical times.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PEFFER. I am surprised, Mr. President, to witness the sensitiveness of Senators upon this point at a time of peril such as we are now passing through, when the people of this country are looking to the men who are congregated in the national Capitol as their lawmakers for counsel and advice. When it comes to our ears that one of the institutions which the Government has established for the purpose of supplying currency to the people is not obeying the law, and that instead of supplying currency they are refusing it, they are hoarding it, it is time that the people should know the truth about it. Hence I have asked for an official answer from the Secretary of the Treasury.

My information is, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] kindly suggested a moment ago, that the banks are being run to-day in open violation of law, that the lawful reserve in New York City alone has been diminished some $19,000,000 below the lawful amount. I am informed reliably by what has been said on this floor, by private correspondence, and by word of mouth, that not only in Boston, in New York, and in Philadelphia, but in other portions of the country, the national bankers are refusing to pay even depositors their own money, and yet we are asked now, in this condition of things, to refer the resolution to the Finance Committee, for no other reason in the world, I am satisfied, with due respect to the integrity of the Senators, but to delay this proceeding and to shield the banks from the consequences of an exposure before the American public.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, a few days ago, in a debate upon the bill to increase the issue of currency by the national banks to the extent of 10 per cent of their bonds and up to the par thereof, the question arose as to what was the course which had been pursued during this time of great financial distress by the banks of the city of New York, and there seemed to be a difference of opinion and a lack of full knowledge in the Senate upon that proposition. I think that since that debate the press of the country has somewhat relieved the Senate's ignorance. There seems now to be no question but that the banks of the city of New York, when checks of their depositors are presented to them, decline to pay the currency upon such checks and demand of the depositor that for the check thus presented he shall receive a clearing-house certificate. That has been frequently stated of late in the press of New York.

I am not ready to say but that that course, which is a technical violation of the law and for which there is perhaps no warrant in the statutes, is probably justifiable under the present deplorable conditions; but I do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that it is well we should cover up from the knowledge of the people exactly what is the course that is being pursued by the national banks of New York and elsewhere. If the existing facts justify such action outside of the pale of the law, the people of the United States are intelligent and patriotic enough to appreciate that that strain of the law is needed at this trying time.

I have in my hand the Sun, which, it is said, "shines for all," and rises daily in the city of New York, of date Monday, August 21, issued since the debate to which I refer, and I find therein an article signed Matthew Marshall. I have no personal acquaintance with him, but I understand that he is one of the trusted financial editors of the New York Sun, who every Monday morning gives to the public an article on the monetary situation. I read from this article the following statement of the facts as they now exist in the city of New York:

"Notwithstanding the large arrivals of gold from Europe and the increase of their reserves, the banks of this city still refuse to pay their depositors in currency, and will do no more than certify checks as good through the clearing-house. Consequently currency can be had in considerable amounts only by paying, as it is said, a premium upon it, which is now about 3 per cent, but the transactions are really sales of claims against the banks at 3 per cent discount. That is to say, the money which a depositor had to his credit on a bank's books a month, and which was then worth par, will now bring only 97 cents of the dollar, with the prospect of a still further depreciation. Many depositors, therefore, instead of buying currency with their checks, pay out the checks themselves to their creditors, who pass them on in turn to other creditors, and thus a new kind of currency has been added to the miscellaneous varieties of it already in circulation. We had: 1, gold coin; 2, silver dollars; 3, silver fractional coin; 4, gold certificates; 5, silver certificates; 6, old legal-tenders; 7, Sherman-act Treasury notes; 8, national-bank notes; and now we have a ninth kind in certified bank checks, the issue of which on an extensive scale by the banks of the South and the West is proposed as a means, in the absence of other money, for moving the crops to market. How grievously our whole currency system needs reorganization and reform this bare statement of its chaotic condition sufficiently testifies, but we seem to have no financiers competent for the task."

I quote further from this interesting article:

"The question is, how much longer our banks can, without bringing on a catastrophe, continue in their course of increasing the volume of clearing-house certificates and of denying to their depositors payment in lawful money of their checks. Thus far depositors have been very patient, and have good-naturedly submitted to the enforced scaling down of their dues; but they can not be expected to submit to it forever. A bank that can not or will not pay claims against it in the regular course of business is, by the decisions of our State courts, insolvent, and, if the bankrupt act of 1867 were now in force, a refusal by a bank for forty days to pay checks on demand would be a commission of bankruptcy."

This extract from the article shows the situation in the city of New York. There can be but little doubt about the truth being as stated by this writer.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I am aware that it is the custom of this body to pass any resolution asking for information from a Department of the Government that any Senator may think he requires in the discharge of his public duty, but I submit that there are exceptions to all rules. There comes a time, as it has come before, when patriotic duty would require nonaction if action would bring further distress upon the people of this country. There are some things, Mr. President, that we are bound to take note of. They are as public as if they were in the written law. For the third or fourth time during our present monetary system we have reached a period when the national banks of the country are powerless to furnish sufficient currency to provide for the current business.

Mr. President, it is not a new case. The same thing occurred in 1873, 1877, and 1890, and now, in 1893, when it was impossible for the banks to literally comply with the law. They violated it by refusing to pay checks when presented, though the amount was on deposit. They issued clearing-house certificates by the millions, as they are doing to-day. They did it openly. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, whose sworn duty it is to enforce the law, may not have had official information of it; but they must know that the strict enforcement of the law would close the doors of many of the best banks in the country. Such action would not only impair the usefulness of the banks, but would affect injuriously every commercial interest. Mr. President, never during the existence of the national banks has a period arrived half as threatening as the one which confronts us now.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the Comptroller of the Currency shuts up the banks, will not the result be that everyone of them will have to be put into the hands of a receiver and nobody will get any money until the receiver pays it out?

Mr. GORMAN. Why, Mr. President, the Senator states the law. He knows that is the law; and the mover of this resolution, and every gentleman of intelligence in the United States, understands that that is the fact. There is not a man I know of outside of this Chamber, no matter what his views may be as to the remedy, who does not know that there is a technical violation of the law, and that it is the patriotic duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to forbear and not add to the distress, but wait until we shall act and give relief.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] yield?

Mr. OATES. There is no one on my side ready to speak now.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I desire the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who has something like two hours remaining, to consume all except such as he himself desires to retain.

Mr. OATES. I will yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to speak upon this bill this evening, and therefore am at some disadvantage; but I feel that it is due from me, as a member of the committee, to defend it as far as I can from the assaults which have been made upon it.

One would suppose, from the remarks of some gentlemen who have discussed this measure, that the bill is devised entirely in the interests of the creditor class. One would suppose that those of us who support the bill are animated entirely by a desire to oppress and to harass those who are so unfortunate as to be debtors, and one would infer from their remarks that they represent exclusively the class of people who are indebted, and that they have no respect whatever for the rights of those who are so unfortunate as to be creditors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States invests in Congress the power to enact a general system of bankruptcy. I do not consider that it carries with it a mandate to enact a general system of bankruptcy, but certainly there is a permission and authority invested in the Congress to enact such a general system whenever in their judgment the condition of the country requires and justifies it.

The framers of the Constitution seemed to look forward to the time when the provincial system existing at the time of its adoption would give way to the closer intercommunication brought about by modern commercial methods.

The time has been when no one was interested in the laws of a locality or a State, except the citizens of that locality or State. The time was when no one could be injuriously affected by the operation of the laws of a State or a municipality, except those who lived within the State or municipality; but, Mr. Chairman, that time has passed away, and the time has come when the commercial interests of the United States demand and require that there shall be a uniform method of liquidation of insolvent estates. The time has come when the merchants of New York, the merchants of Philadelphia, the merchants of Chicago, the merchants of any great city in this Union, the merchants in any county or State, are interested in a uniform interpretation of what is recognized as the general commercial law of the country, and the uniform liquidation of estates of those who have failed in business, and this as much in the interest of those who fail as of their creditors.

Now, sir, it is not proposed to interfere with any local statutes or any State statutes which are for the protection of the debtor. The law does not propose to interfere with any of them. It merely proposes that when any debtor finds himself unable to pay his debts, or when he has committed any one of the acts which, under the law, gives ground for putting him into bankruptcy, that his property and assets shall be liquidated by an uniform rule, which shall guarantee to every creditor in any part of the United States a fair share in that distribution.

Mr. Chairman, I confess I stand absolutely amazed by the strictures and denunciations which are put upon this measure by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE]. Why, sir, he almost goes into spasms because national banks are not included in its provisions. It has been said here repeatedly, and so often that I repeat it with a certain degree of hesitation, that the reason why national banks are not included within the provisions of this law is because we have a rigorous and summary method of liquidating the affairs of any national bank which may appear to be insolvent or which fails to meet its obligations, whether solvent or insolvent. No national bank can refuse to honor a check drawn against a deposit, no national bank can afford not to redeem a certificate of deposit, no national bank can fail to comply with any of its obligations or contracts without incurring the penalty of immediate suspension and liquidation under the authority of the officers of the Government.

National banks are not subjected to the provisions of this bill, simply because the laws already upon the statute book are fully sufficient to protect the rights of depositors, and the rights of every one who may be interested in them, and it would be idle to supply other means of liquidation when those now provided by law have been found to be ample and effective. We have for them a general and uniform system of bankruptcy far more rigorous than that now proposed. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] refers to persons who have deposited their money in national banks, the poor depositors who have saved up their money against a rainy day, who, when they go to the national banks, are told, "We must have your confidence, but we can not give you your money." Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] know of any instance where a national bank has failed to pay a depositor, where the depositor could not, if he saw fit, take proceedings to put that bank into immediate suspension?

Why, sir, the law has not been suspended by the condition of the country for the last six or eight months; and the fact that no one proceeded against the banks and put them into suspension because of inability to meet their obligations only shows that the depositors and creditors of those institutions had confidence in them, and felt that it would be better for the general interests of the country that they should extend them consideration rather than involve them in the ruin that would be brought about by enforced liquidation at that time.

The gentleman forgets that according to his argument the moment a national bank or anyone else can not or does not pay his debts, that moment he becomes an innocent and persecuted debtor. That instant any proceedings invoked to enforce rights become oppressive. The creditor, however poor or however wronged by the failure of his debtor, becomes a remorseless, unpatriotic tyrant, who should be reprobated by the law the moment he attempts to assert his rights, and however wealthy the debtor may be, however great his resources may be, however great the assets in his hands may be, however great his obligation to respond to the demands of his creditors, and, finally, however fraudulent his conduct may have been, ought to be the special care of the law, and protected against the oppressive demands of creditors that property paid for with their money shall be subjected to sale in satisfaction of the just debts of the insolvent. He forgets that a bank would, the moment it closed its doors, unable to meet its obligations, become one of the unfortunate victims for whom his sympathy is so great, and he forgets also that the wealthy wholesale and great traders not infrequently fail, bringing ruin to many persons so unfortunate as to be their creditors. Has he no sympathy for the creditor whose all is involved in a failure, and who is in danger of failure himself because of inability to get what is due him? Is he entitled to no consideration? Has he no rights which the gentleman respects, and is he to be treated as criminal because he is a creditor? Now, sir, gentlemen say that this bill is not demanded by the country. They ignore the fact that the demand for it comes up from the commercial interests who alone are affected by the involuntary features of the law from practically all over the country.

It is not only asked for by the wholesalers, but by the retailers, because they all recognize that the scope, object, and effect of the law will be to cheapen credit by giving certainty to business transactions and protecting them against the frauds that are constantly being perpetrated. The wholesaler specially realizes that he will have less to charge up for bad debts, and will incur less loss from failures than under present conditions. He will know that in case of insolvency the assets of the debtor can be brought into court for distribution; that the debtor will no longer be permitted to select the assignee, in whose integrity and capacity his creditors are alone interested; that collusive attachments and sham sales, the convenient and accessible shelter of the fraudulent debtor, will be practically things of the past, and that goods sold by one dealer in due course of business, and to be disposed of in that way, may not be immediately transferred to a "preferred" creditor, or given in payment of a doubtful debt to a member of the debtor's family.

It is to the permanent interest of no one that frauds in business shall be encouraged and facilitated by refusing legislation that will make them difficult of accomplishment and easy of detection. The "trade," as it is called, is fully impressed that legislation of this character will be a protection to the fair dealer and a constant menace to those who would if they could, and as they frequently do, enrich themselves by buying goods which they never pay for and never expected to pay for when they bought them.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Mississippi makes scarecrows himself and gets frightened at them.

The bill will not affect the farmers of his district unless they voluntarily invoke its protection. The merchants of his district, I will guarantee, are making no protest against it. He imagines a case where people are owing money in the summer, at a time when money can not be raised to pay debts, when he says they ought be let alone until they can make their crops, so that they will be able to meet their obligations.

In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I would state that people do not usually make debts payable in summer, when they can not get the money to pay them; but if they do, they ordinarily get extensions when they are entitled to them, because the average creditor never resorts to legal proceedings except as a last resort. Why, what lawyer upon this floor has known, and how many instances have they in their experience known, of a creditor who would go to law, who would take all the expense of precipitating litigation, that would run the risk not only of losing the debt, but of incurring heavy damages and expense, except as a last resort and when he saw no other means available to protect his rights.

If a debtor says, "I can not pay now, but I will be able to pay you at such and such a time," and is able to make a reasonable showing of his ability to do it, is it not the experience of every man upon this floor, of every man who has had anything to do with business of this character, that the creditor is always glad to accept it? I have had for my age a long experience as a practitioner, and I have not in my practice ever known of a single case of the institution of a malicious suit. I have never known a creditor to take out an attachment for the purpose of breaking up his debtor. I have never known a man to institute a malicious suit for the recovery of what he did not believe to be due him. I have known many men mulcted in damages for taking out attachments where the result was the debtor had shown that he had no intention to defraud his creditors, or made it to appear that way; and the party who brought the attachment suit was not only mulcted in damages, but the debtor succeeded in placing all his property beyond the reach of his creditors.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when we come to legislate in this House we should not look at any question which is presented to us from the standpoint of classes. We should not legislate in the interest of debtors; we should not legislate in the interest of creditors. I do not understand that there are any gentlemen here who represent exclusively either debtors or creditors. I am here in the advocacy of this bill, not as it stands, but with amendments; preserving, however, the general aspect and scope of the bill, merely for the purpose of giving to the country a conservative measure which will restore confidence to business, which will cheapen credits, which will insure a just, honest, economical administration of insolvent estates wherever debtors admit or wherever the courts decide that they are insolvent, are unable to pay their debts, and apply for relief, or have committed acts inconsistent with honest intention, and which renders a continuance of business impossible.

Simply that, Mr. Chairman, and nothing more. I would not stand here to advocate or support a measure which can be justly characterized as unpatriotic or as oppressive, and when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] and other gentlemen rise here and denounce this measure in that way, I think they are going beyond the bounds of reason. I think they are going beyond what the character of the gentlemen who advocate the bill justifies. I think they are taking rather too much upon themselves when they assume the position of champions and defenders of the oppressed classes against the attacks of other gentlemen here who represent people as virtuous as their own, who have as much interest, as much conscience, and as much sense of duty to stand by their constituents as have those who constitute themselves the champions of the people whom they profess to regard as likely to be oppressed by this bill.

Now, sir, before taking my seat I want to call attention briefly to certain amendments which I propose to suggest at the proper time. I shall move that the causes of bankruptcy be limited to cases of actual fraud, that no man be made subject to be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt unless he has absconded and remains absconded; unless he has sold his property with intent to defraud his creditors, or has converted it into negotiable assets, with the same intent; unless he has confessed a collusive judgment or taken some other collusive proceeding for the purpose of fraudulently preferring certain creditors. To these grounds the provisions of the bill in relation to involuntary bankruptcy in my judgment ought to be limited. I think also that the extreme penalties contained in the bill ought to be taken out.

I think there ought to be nothing in the bill imposing a penalty upon a man for anything that he does unless it is done after he has filed a petition to be adjudged a bankrupt, or in contemplation thereof, or after a petition has been filed against him to adjudge him a bankrupt or in contemplation thereof; and that he ought to have his honorable discharge if he has faithfully surrendered all his property and complied with the requirements of the law and the judgment of the court. To such provisions I think the bill ought to be limited. It ought to respect the laws of the States which authorize preferences. It ought to provide for setting aside only those preferences which are fraudulent and which would be held to be so by the courts of the States where they reside. It ought to respect the homestead and exemption laws of the States.

In other words, it ought to respect all the rights given to the citizen by the laws of the State wherein he resides, and that is the real scope of the bill as it is urged upon the House. Gentlemen who are opposing it here have been repeatedly informed that the friends of the bill were ready to support amendments which would limit its scope in the way I have suggested. Yet in the face of that information we have seen them going on here fighting windmills, torturing the provisions of the bill, making mountains out of molehills, and trying to show that provisions which are entirely innocent are extremely oppressive. For instance, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] calls the attention of the House to a provision which imposes a penalty for a referee who fails to make a report to the Attorney-General of the business conducted before him.

The provision of the bill requiring the referee in each case to make a report to the Attorney-General is merely for statistical purposes, and a failure to comply with it is merely a failure to comply with a formal regulation, and is punishable by a fine of $100; but the gentleman from Mississippi would have the House believe that that penalty would apply to a case of misappropriation of $1,000 or $10,000! He described an imaginary case where on the one side the insolvent debtor was liable to imprisonment for two years for failing to make a correct and full surrender of his property, while, as he said, the referee, on the other hand, might embezzle $10,000 and only be sent to the parish jail and fined $100. The referee handles no money; the trustee handles it all, and the gentleman ought to have known that if the trustee fails to account for the funds in his hands he will be liable to prosecution under the general law for embezzlement, and, upon conviction, will be subject to the punishment which the law provides for that offense.

Yet the gentleman from Mississippi would have the House believe that, under the provision which he read, the referee could embezzle the funds and escape with a light fine.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You mean the trustee.

Mr. BOATNER. No, I mean the referee; I am quoting what the gentleman from Mississippi said.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi referred the House to another section of this bill, a section which provides that an insolvent may be prosecuted and convicted for doing certain things, among which is his failing to disclose the names of all his creditors. Now, what is the reason of that provision? Suppose an insolvent discloses the names of only a portion of his creditors and they by collusion and combination with him carry through bankruptcy proceedings, enormous injury might in this way be done to other creditors whose names are not disclosed. I say that an insolvent debtor by furnishing a false schedule of his debts, thus notifying only those parties whom he desires to notify, might perpetrate fraud upon others who were not notified. Therefore there should be, of course, some penalty to compel a full and substantially correct statement of his indebtedness.

More than that, he should be liable to punishment if he puts down as a creditor one who is not a creditor. It seems to me almost self-evident that an act of this kind should be provided against by proper penalties. If not, what would be the difficulty in the insolvent putting upon his schedule the names of friends of his to whom he had given simulated or sham evidences of indebtedness, and who, acting as creditors, might come in and vote as his interests might dictate? I might go on, Mr. Speaker, and successfully refute every criticism made, but the good sense of this House renders it unnecessary. The attacks on the administration of the bankrupt act of 1867 by Judge E. H. Durell have no application to this bill. That unfortunate official was driven from the bench in disgrace and has answered in the highest court of last resort. I do not feel called upon either to attack or defend him; but if he were upon the Federal bench now the frauds perpetrated under the act of 1867 would be impossible. The points of weakness in that bill are guarded and protected in this, but the honorable gentleman should borrow no trouble about that. He seems to be only concerned about the debtors, and they did not complain even of the act of 1867.

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

In compliance with the foregoing the Vice-President appointed Mr. QUAY, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. CAREY, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. KYLE as said committee.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives relative to the statue of Gen. James Shields, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions.

Mr. CULLOM. I would ask the consideration of the resolutions at this time but for the fact that my colleague [Mr. PALMER] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] are expected to say something on the subject and they are not now present. As soon as those gentlemen come in I shall call up the resolutions for consideration. In the meantime let the resolutions lie on the table.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 121) for the relief of William A. Harkweather, of Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that it should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know why. It is purely a matter relating to the collection of revenue.

Mr. FRYE. But all such bills go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. All similar bills have heretofore gone to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce has entire jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course I submit to custom, but I supposed the Committee on Finance to be the appropriate committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1203) to amend sections numbered 3433, 3433*a*, 3433*b*, and 3434, internal revenue laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, so far as in his opinion it shall not be inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of all instructions which may have been given to any representative of the United States, or any naval officer thereof, since the 4th day of March, 1881, in regard to the preservation of public order in Hawaii, or the protection of the lives and property of American citizens, or the recognition or support of any government there.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday to suggest that the resolution should lie over until the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is present.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; I made no such suggestion.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator did not?

Mr. CULLOM. May I interfere for a moment? I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will let the resolution be laid aside informally that I may call up another.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, if the Senator's resolution leads to no debate.

Mr. CULLOM. It is in relation to the statue that will be unveiled to-day in Statuary Hall; and whatever is done about it ought to be done at this hour.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with such an act of graceful public recognition of Gen. Shields, and therefore I will consent that the resolution shall stand over until to-morrow. How long will the resolution of the Senator from Illinois take?

Mr. CULLOM. Three-quarters of an hour, perhaps.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the pending resolution may go over until the end of the consideration of the Senator's resolution and then be continued, notwithstanding the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not seek to displace it in any way except for the present consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; let the resolution lie on the table informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts will lie on the table for the present.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the resolutions of the House of Representatives be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 5, 1893.

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 6th day of December, at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon, be designated and set apart for the consideration of the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Illinois, for the statue of Gen. James Shields, whose name is so honorably identified with the history of the State and of the United States.

Resolved, That this statue is accepted in the name of the United States, and is assigned a place in the old hall of the House of Representatives, already set aside by act of Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of my friend from Illinois how the resolutions come here.

Mr. CULLOM. They have come from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions were received from the House of Representatives, the Chair will state.

Mr. HOAR. As the resolutions were read it is the action of the House of Representatives setting apart in that body a time for the consideration of a certain subject.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a concurrent resolution adopted by the other House and sent here.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolutions of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. The resolutions seem to me very extraordinary in form. As the Secretary read them it is simply the action of the House of Representatives that a certain time in the future, to wit, 1 o'clock to-day, forty minutes hence, be there set apart for the consideration of the subject. Nothing else has passed the House. The concurrent resolution is something which the House is to take up forty minutes hence, and I submit respectfully that there is nothing before the Senate now.

Mr. CULLOM. For the purpose of settling the matter I will introduce a concurrent resolution in the Senate and ask for its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; let that be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be tendered to the governor, to the Legislature, and to the people of the State of Illinois, for the statue of Gen. James Shields, whose name is so closely identified with the history of Illinois and of the United States, by his eminent services as a soldier, jurist, and statesman.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted and assigned to a place in Statuary Hall (the old Hall of Representatives), and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate and by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of Illinois.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolutions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether there is a precedent for tendering the thanks of Congress to the authorities of a State on an occasion of this kind?

Mr. CULLOM. It was done in the case of the Cass statue; and I think in almost every other case where action was taken by Congress in reference to a statue.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not myself remember such a case.

Mr. CULLOM. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that I looked the matter up, and I found this to be the practice.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me that he should proceed upon his resolutions.

Mr. CULLOM. That I propose to do.

Mr. HOAR. That is strictly in order; but the House resolutions are not before the Senate, except as a mere matter of information.

Mr. CULLOM. I offered my own resolutions with that view; and now, if the Senate will allow me, I will make a few remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois are before the Senate, and the Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the State of Illinois, responding to the act of Congress which extended to the several States an invitation to provide and furnish statues, not exceeding two from each State, of deceased citizens illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished military or civic services, has presented a statue, which now stands in the famous hall designated for its reception, of one whose name and services have long been familiar to the people of this country—Gen. James Shields. This statue is the first presented by Illinois to the National Government. The nation has done itself and the State of Illinois, which claims the martyred President as her son, great honor by placing the statue of Lincoln by the side of those of Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton.

Mr. President, the soldier and statesman whose statue is received to-day was a native of Ireland, born in the city of Dungannon, county Tyrone, in 1810. At the age of 16, filled with enthusiasm for America and liberty, he found his way to the United States, and soon after his arrival began the study of the law. He located in Kaskaskia, the then capital of Illinois, and commenced the practice of his chosen profession.

In a few years he was elected to the State Legislature from his county, though not at the time a naturalized citizen. Subsequently he was chosen auditor of the State. In 1843 he became one of the judges of the supreme court of the State, and afterward was appointed by President Polk Commissioner of the General Land Office. While in this office the United States became involved in a war with Mexico; and the State of Illinois, ever ready to defend the flag and maintain the honor of the nation, furnished six regiments of volunteers—its quota of troops—which were placed in camp. Gen. Shields resigned his office as Commissioner of the General Land Office, was commissioned brigadier-general, and ordered to take command of the camp of Illinois troops. He did not have command of all these troops in Mexico, but he commanded there a brigade, and made a name for courage and patriotism not surpassed by any other soldier on any bloody field. In the battle of Cerro Gordo he was severely wounded and borne from the field, Col. E. D. Baker succeeding him in command.

Mr. President, you are familiar with the names of the brave men of our State who took part in the Mexican war: John J. Hardin, who dashed down to death, but who made sure of victory for American arms at Buena Vista; the gallant and honored Bissell; the generous and patriotic Irish soldier, Shields; the brave and accomplished orator, Baker; with Richardson, Logan, Oglesby, Morrison, Forman, Harris, Ross, and many other brave men who did gallant service in that war.

It is a remarkable fact that not less than five of the men who went from Illinois to the Mexican war afterwards became distinguished members of this Senate: Gen. Shields, Gen. Baker, Gen. Richardson, Gen. Logan, and Gen. Oglesby. In addition to these, Bissell became a distinguished member of the House of Representatives and afterward governor of the State, and Col. Thomas L. Harris and Hon. Lewis W. Ross became active and influential members of the House of Representatives.

Gen. Shields recovered from what at the time was believed to be a fatal wound, returned to duty and in the battle of Chapultepec was again severely wounded. In these great battles, the first under Gen. Taylor and the second under Gen. Scott, he fought gallantly, knowing no fear, was wounded severly in each, but doing much to bring victory to American arms. And I have been told that he received in the different wars in which he took part, in defense of his country, not less than eleven wounds.

Gen. Shields was mustered out of the military service in July, 1848, and was immediately tendered the office of governor of Oregon Territory, which, so far as I can learn, he declined. In 1849, a little more than a year after he returned from the Mexican war, and after a spirited contest, he was elected as a Democrat to the United States Senate. Not having been a citizen of the country for the constitutional period of nine years, the Senate declared his election void, after he had duly qualified. To fill the vacancy thus caused, the Illinois Legislature was convened in extraordinary session in October following, and Gen. Shields being now eligible (it was after he had become eligible under the United States Constitution), was again elected. He thus enjoyed the unusual honor of having been twice elected and qualified as a United States Senator in the same year.

In this high office he served the State faithfully and ably, as he had in every other position of trust and honor. After the expiration of his Senatorial term, Gen. Shields removed from Illinois to Minnesota Territory, and on the admission of that State into the Union he was elected United States Senator, and served until March 3, 1859. Following the promptings of his restless spirit, this energetic man, after retiring from the Senate, removed to California, and still later was engaged in mining and kindred pursuits in Mexico, until the breaking out of our great civil war.

With the true spirit of American chivalry, he at once tendered his services to the United States Government, and in 1861 he was again appointed brigadier-general of volunteers. He accordingly entered the service and in less than a year was so severely wounded at the battle of Kernstown (here in Virginia, near Winchester), in March, 1862, that he was compelled to resign on account of the permanent injuries received. He thereafter removed to Wisconsin, where he took part in the politics of that State, as a Democrat, and at one time acted as chairman of the Democratic State convention. Subsequently he moved to Missouri, and held important offices, both by election and appointment, having been successively railroad commissioner and member of the State Legislature. I have been reminded that he was in that State also elected a member of Congress from the district in which he lived, but failed to secure his seat.

Finally, after the death of Senator Louis V. Bogy, he was elected by the Legislature to succeed Senator Armstrong, who had been appointed to fill the vacancy until the convening of the Legislature. Gen. Shields again took his seat in the United States Senate in January, 1879, and retired in March following, upon the expiration of the term. He was succeeded in the Senate by the distinguished Senator [Mr. VEST] who now represents that State with such marked ability.

Mr. President, the simple recital of the wonderful career of Gen. Shields, giving but a brief outline, seems almost like a dream of fancy, a romance of imagination. No other American citizen, native or naturalized, has ever been certified or commissioned as a member of this Senate by three different great States. The announcement of the fact that Gen. Shields was so commissioned carries with it the irresistible conclusion that he was no ordinary man. It is proof in itself that he possessed qualities of head and heart that drew around him his fellow-men wherever he went or in whatever he was engaged, whether in field or forum.

Mr. President, while he was foreign-born, yet no American citizen has ever shown a greater devotion to American institutions; no American citizen has ever shown greater affection for the Union and the flag; neither did any patriot show more willingness to spill his blood for human liberty. He was the close friend of Douglas, serving with him upon the supreme bench of Illinois, and was also his colleague in this Senate. He was an admirer of Gen. Taylor, and spoke of him as "Old Rough and Ready." He was the friend of the Union soldier, and his last period of service in the Senate was marked by his fervent appeal in behalf of the veterans of the Mexican war.

The civil war was then over: a grateful people were showing a spirit of liberality toward those who had served in it and to their widows and orphans in granting liberal pensions and bounties. He was in full sympathy with the spirit which prevailed in the North, but he felt that the veterans of the Mexican war were being lost sight of, and in behalf of his comrades of that war he called the attention of the Senate to the services of the army in securing to the nation the command of the Pacific Slope by the acquisition of territory on our Western border, stretching 700 miles north and south and 900 miles east and west. In the simplest language he said:

> Give us a little of that we helped to secure for our country; give us a small pittance to help us while on the downward path of life in our old days; give us something so assist us in our last days when we are marching to that field from which no warrior has ever returned victorious.

This was an eloquent appeal, and in itself is proof that the real beauty of eloquence is in simplicity of utterance. He was not pleading for himself—Congress had dealt kindly by him; he was receiving a pension of $100 per month, which after his death was continued to his widow and children. Gen. Shields died in June, 1879, in Ottumwa, Iowa.

When the Mexican war ended, having commanded troops from the States of Illinois and South Carolina, he was honored by both States, the Legislature of each of which presented him with a richly mounted sword in consideration of the gallant and meritorious services rendered by him in the war. He was in command of troops of both States when he received his last wound. After his death these swords were purchased by the National Government from his widow and placed in the military archives of the nation.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this brief story shows Gen. Shields to have been one of the most illustrious men of our country. He was a hero, patriot, soldier, and statesman. He believed in his adopted country, and was ever ready to fight for its flag in war, as he always served it faithfully in peace. He could not perhaps be said to have been an orator equal to Daniel O'Connell, who was called Ireland's liberator, or of Grattan, who, in condemning a measure in the Irish Parliament, uttered these memorable words:

> I will remain anchored here with fidelity to the fortunes of my country, faithful to her freedom, faithful to her fall; or of Curran, the great advocate in the trial of causes. Shields had not the power of eloquence of either, but he was the equal of either in steadfastness to duty and in courage to perform it.

Mr. President, I should be unjust to the feelings of my own heart if I failed to refer on this occasion to the circumstances of my last meeting with Gen. Shields. Some who hear me will remember the day, some fifteen years ago, when the people of my own and several adjacent States met at Mount Vernon, Ill., to participate in perhaps the grandest meeting ever held in the Mississippi Valley, a reunion of the soldiers of five wars. Among the many thousands who gathered there were two or three solitary, wrinkled, and decrepit men, aged fathers, still surviving from the war of 1812; a number of the remnants of the Black Hawk and Winnebago Indian wars; others who had marched to Nauvoo in the Mormon war; there were veterans who had survived the deadly Mexican campaign, and there were very many who had left their records upon a hundred fields in the last great struggle which ended in 1865.

I can now without impropriety refer by name to some of great renown, now passed from earth, who that day cried "Hail" and "Welcome" to that vast multitude. The Army of the nation was represented by its great general, Sherman, then in his brightest mood, whose hearty handshake sent a thrill through the very soul of every greeting comrade: there was Logan, the volunteer soldier and the idol of his State, now gone forever from these Halls; and there was Shields, the adopted citizen, a soldier brave as the bravest, a statesman honored repeatedly by my State, wearing a wreath of honor conferred by three great commonwealths, a tribute of higher value than ever crowned a Roman senator.

I do not detract from the living in giving praise to such noble dead. It is a blessed memory to me, and it will remain with me always—the memory of that day when I stood face to face with men whose names now shed a glory upon the pages of American history. And of those aged and wearied forms who were met there, how many are now with the dust? How few now live?

Men who remembered the massacre at Chicago and the surrender at Detroit; those who had fought Tecumseh and battled at Peoria; men who had shaken hands with Lafayette at Kaskaskia; men who had marched to fight Black Hawk in 1832; those who had been mustered at Nauvoo in 1845; men who returned victorious from Mexico in 1847—all these, with unnumbered citizen soldiers of our own time, were there. And Shields, the brave and fearless Shields, was there, first to welcome and then to bid us all farewell.

What monarchy could present such a scene? What emperor could command such an audience? Where but in America could every man feel that this was his reunion; that this was his country, and these his comrades and his brothers?

I have gazed with pleasure upon the memorial statues which a grateful and reverent people have erected in the thronged and crowded street of the Irish capital city of Dublin, to O'Connell and Grattan, the patriot statesman and the great orator. May I hope, Mr. President, that this statue which the State of Illinois, on invitation of the General Government, this day unveils and presents in this Pantheon of America, will ever remain as a suitable memorial of the illustrious soldier and statesman, Shields?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the State of Missouri thanks Illinois for placing in this Capitol the statue of Gen. James Shields with that of Abraham Lincoln, her most distinguished citizen.

It is eminently suggestive and proper that the great Commonwealth which honored them both should have here the statues of Lincoln and Shields, always politically adversaries and at one time personal enemies, but never divided in their love of country. It augurs well for the future that the petty divisions of political opinion are thus obliterated, and the people of our whole country, so long as the Government exists, can look upon the marble images of those who differed in methods but not in motives, and of whom the impartial judgment of their countrymen has declared that they "deserve well of the Republic."

Of all the eminent men whose names will appear in our country's history, James Shields alone has represented three sovereign States in the Senate of the United States. It is equally significant that when he came to the Senate on each occasion he represented the same opinions and policies upon public questions.

At the close of the last war he became a citizen of Missouri, and in 1868 was elected to the National House of Representatives from the Kansas City district, but a portion of the returns were destroyed in the office of the Secretary of State, and the old hero was thus defrauded of his rightful title. He was afterward elected to the popular branch of the State General Assembly, and in 1879 was sent to this body, serving out the unexpired term of Lewis V. Bogy.

Cast in heroic mold, steadfast in conviction, a stranger to fear and duplicity, this soldier-statesman is the most illustrious representative of those Irish-Americans who baptized in blood their allegiance to our free institutions.

Illinois, Minnesota, and Missouri especially honored him when living, and the whole Union now claims his glorious career as a common legacy: but in Missouri, among the people who loved him above all others, rest his ashes. We will guard them well, for in all our broad domain never has there been a life which better illustrated American manhood or shed greater luster upon the American name.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the political career of Gen. Shields, varied and successful as it was, began in the State of Minnesota, it is manifestly proper that a representative of that State should say some words upon the present occasion.

The career of Gen. Shields illustrates and exemplifies beyond any precedent that occurs to me, the capacity of our institutions for the successful political and military advancement of those who love those institutions, wherever they may have been born, or whatever their political antecedents may have been.

Gen. Shields was a Senator from three States. He was a veteran of two wars. His personal valor largely contributed to the acquisition of an empire to the United States, and the same valor vastly contributed to the establishment of our institutions upon foundations of permanency.

After the remarks of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and those of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] nothing is left for me to say by way of history or eulogium.

Gen. Shields belonged to a generation in Minnesota which laid the foundation of that Commonwealth. The most of them have passed away. I never knew him; I never saw him. His name is almost a tradition in our State; but, Mr. President, being, as he was, among those early pioneers who established that great and growing Commonwealth by his record of gallantry, his charms of personal manner, of which the tradition yet remains, he became one of the first Senators from that State, and these ceremonies, instituted by the State of Illinois, commemorative of the distinguished services, military and political, of this alien-born and yet patriotic citizen, will be intensely gratifying to those who remember Gen. Shields and to the people of his nationality in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois, who has been its governor and who has so long represented it in this body, has very fittingly and properly performed the duty of speaking for the State and in paying its tribute to the great fame of Gen. James Shields. There remains for me but little more than to ask the adoption of the resolutions now before the Senate.

Mr. President, word painters, like other painters, sometimes fail to observe the fitting accessories and surroundings of their portrait. In order to understand the character of Gen. Shields, it must be known who were his rivals, who it was that engaged with him in the generous contests for both professional and political honors in Illinois. Without thus observing those who were his rivals and opponents, we should not properly appreciate and but little would we understand the true life and manhood and greatness of Lincoln. To delineate a giant and surround him with pigmies would convey no impression of his real power. So it is almost always the case that the biographer, in his admiration for his hero, forgets the essential conditions which surround him and which go to make up his greatness.

I met James Shields in October, 1840, at one of the circuits in Illinois. I had just come into possession of that which I regarded as almost a patent of nobility—a license to practice the profession of the law. At that court Sidney Breese, the great jurist and subsequently a distinguished Senator from Illinois, presided. Alexander P. Field, whose eloquence is still a tradition in central and southern Illinois, was there; and Gustavus Koerner, still living, wise and profound. He had been a citizen but a few years, and was then distinguished for the great characteristics which have made him so well known since.

These were the leaders of that bar. I admired them. They became to me objects of emulation. I met the general, then Mr. Shields, a month later at Vandalia. There the same lawyers were present, with the addition of Joseph Gillespie, that solid jurist, devotee of ancient black-letter law, a master of the science of special pleading, which he understood so well and which science he survived, it having perished by the blows mainly of men who never understood it or appreciated it. There we were joined by Usher F. Linder, the orator and wit of the bar of the State. Those were the men with whom Gen. Shields was called upon to contend for professional honors.

Later I knew him when he was the associate of Lincoln and Douglas and many other great men whose names now escape my memory. He was not like them. He was not like Douglas nor like Lincoln nor like Baker, but he was a foeman worthy of the steel of any of them at any time, either at the bar or in the Legislature.

I knew him subsequently when as a judge he presided in the circuit where I had a few clients. He was generous and just, not profoundly learned; but his acumen and his discrimination, his power of perceiving and weighing arguments addressed to him was something remarkable. His intuitive perception of justice and right was such as made him the very refuge of the oppressed and the wronged.

I knew him subsequently, when he had an office under the State government. I knew him when he was appointed to the Army. I was present when he returned and was welcomed at Springfield.

We were political associates and personal friends. I regarded him as being somewhat unique, somewhat unlike other men, but still a remarkable man, and I cluster around him from memory names of these great men that he may be properly appreciated and understood, because greatness can never be manifested except on great occasions or in contests between great men. Wars of giants attract the attention of mankind, but wars between the pigmy and the giant have no attractions for any considerate mind.

I observed Gen. Shields's political course. It was my misfortune to differ with him on a great public question. I was a member of the State Legislature at the expiration of his term of service in this body. I was compelled by my convictions of political and public duty to vote for another for a seat in this honorable body. I did so, and my nomination and vote gave to this body another one of the great men of whom Illinois is so proud. It gave to the Senate Lyman Trumbull, whose great services as a jurist as well as a statesman are written upon the statute books of the Republic. This, I am proud to say, had no influence upon the personal relations between Gen. Shields and myself. We continued to be friends. He left Illinois soon after and became a citizen of Minnesota, and reappeared in this body as the Representative of that young Commonwealth.

His military history is a part of the inheritance of the country. That he distinguished himself in Mexico we know, and especially in Illinois it is remembered and known to all that he distinguished himself in the late civil war also. We have been proud of his fame. An alien by birth, Illinois took him to her bosom and cherished him as if he had been her own son.

My relations to him, I repeat, were of the kindest character. I esteemed him and respected him. His conduct toward me was always that of generous friendship, and to-day I take pleasure in asking the Senate to pass these resolutions in order that Illinois may place in the Capitol its selected memorial of her great adopted son.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 198) to grant to the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Company a right of way over the public lands traversed by it; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for land within the Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 77) conferring diplomas upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. 198) to grant to the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Company a right of way over the public lands traversed by it; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for land within the Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOAR. I now call up the resolution which I submitted yesterday, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, so far as in his opinion it shall not be inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate copies of all instructions which may have been given to any representative of the United States, or any naval officer thereof, since the 4th day of March, 1861, in regard to the preservation of public order in Hawaii, or the protection of the lives and property of American citizens, or the recognition or support of any government there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this resolution is an ordinary resolution of inquiry such as the Senate rarely hesitates to pass on the request of any member of the body. It simply asks for information in regard to facts of public interest necessary for the information of all Senators in the discharge of their public duties, and, in accordance with the custom in such matters, it expressly defers to the President's judgment in the matter as to whether any particular paper or other fact asked for should or should not be made public with due regard to the interests of the public service.

It has not seemed to me that there was any occasion for delay in the passage of this resolution because of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MORGAN]. He may have from private sources or from private consultations with the Administration all the information which is needed by other Senators who do not sustain that confidential relation.

The resolution asks for the instructions which indicate the attitude of this Government toward Hawaii in three Administrations; first, that of the first Administration of the present President of the United States, then for the instructions given by the two able and eminent gentlemen who filled the office of Secretary of State during the last Administration, and for the instructions which have gone out during the present Administration.

I hope and believe that those instructions will show a settled and consistent policy, certainly down to a very recent time, in regard to which there has been no party or political difference of opinion.

If the President's message means anything, so far as I can understand it, it means that the Executive of the United States is meditating and considering the question whether he shall, by his own executive authority, commit an act of war against a friendly power. There can be no question that the Government which was in power in Hawaii at the last advices is a friendly Government. It established itself without violence, after an attempt on the part of the Queen to commit an act of revolution and usurpation, which is admitted and conceded by all parties. The Queen undertook of her own authority and in violation of a written existing constitution to exclude from the right of suffrage in that nation a large and important portion of its citizens, important in regard to numbers, in regard to character, in regard to intelligence, and in regard to property. I suppose nobody will be so hardy as to deny that that was a gross attempt at usurpation and revolution.

Now, the people, or some of them, resisted that act and set up a new government, and that government has been recognized by all the civilized powers of the world, so far as we are aware, who have international relations with Hawaii. It has been recognized by the Government of the United States. It is represented at the capital of the United States by a duly accredited representative, and is recognized by the present Executive, with whom he is in diplomatic intercourse; and therefore to undertake on any pretense whatever, or for any reason whatever, to enter that kingdom or republic, or however it may be defined and described, and overthrow the existing government is an act of war; and it is none the less an act of war that it is an act meditated, or proposed, or committed against a feeble and small government.

Now, Mr. President, the suggestion that the United States may have acted with undue haste in the recognition of this government or that it may have violated international law by taking part in the revolution that established it, will not in my judgment bear examination for a moment. If at some time in the past this country, even in violation of right, had aided in putting in power a government which has since that time been recognized by us and by other countries as a lawful government and is lawfully and peacefully exercising its functions, is it possible that because that might have happened there is any duty or any right under the law of nations, after the fact in the past has become established, to make war on that government and overthrow it and put in power another? If that be true, it was clearly the duty of France, whenever after our Revolutionary war she should see fit, to have joined Great Britain in overthrowing the United States and putting the Colonies under the English power once more. I suppose there can be no question that our treaty of alliance with France, which contributed so much to the establishment of our independence, was a violation of international obligation as between France and England.

The matter of the establishment of that government is a fact and not a question of right or wrong, as far as all other governments are concerned. There is scarcely a government on this continent south of us (and, indeed, we must include our own Government in the statement) that does not owe its existence to a revolution, as to the rightfulness of which there is debate and discussion and question, and in regard to which the defeated party and perhaps other nations may have something to say if they are to express an opinion about it. However, international law recognizes nothing but the fact of government, and it can in the nature of things recognize nothing but the fact of government.

Now, Mr. President, if what the President implies in his message be true, that because he has concluded there was some wrongful action on the part of our minister under a previous Administration in aiding the establishment of the present government he thinks it is his duty to overthrow it and put another one in power, he is meditating an act of war against Hawaii and it is impossible to escape from that conclusion. I think the department of the Government with whom the power and duty under the Constitution of declaring war under proper circumstances are lodged is entitled to prompt and immediate knowledge of all the facts which bear upon the question.

There are some other things that seem to me singular and indefensible in this transaction. I shall not now go the length of declaring that under no circumstances ought the President of the United States to send a commissioner abroad without the authority of express legislation for the purpose or without the advice and consent of the Senate. But certainly the cases are very rare when that ought to be done. Its being done can be justified only in the case of a grave, imminent, and pressing emergency and public danger.

This gentleman was sent abroad when the Senate was in session, on the 7th of March, 1893, with full opportunity on the part of the President to consult this body. He was sent abroad with the duties practically of a diplomatic representative of this Government. The report to which the President alludes shows that he is in constant communication with the authorities of Hawaii and is informing them officially what this Government will do and will not do. His orders gave him paramount authority; and in addition to that he seems to have assumed the duty and the power of determining whether or not certain orders should be given to the naval officers of the United States in the port of Honolulu.

If the power to make diplomatic representations to foreign governments and the power to issue orders to our own naval officers and the power to pull down the American flag where it was peacefully floating be not an official power, I should like to know what definition can be given of official power as distinguished from personal agency. But if the President of the United States could exercise his own functions by a deputy, yet here, with the Senate in session and the three-months' session of Congress having since intervened, it is very strange that the Executive of the United States has undertaken to commit to this gentleman these delicate and important official responsibilities without even communicating the fact officially either to the Senate or to Congress. As far as possible the United States is to be dragged into a war in strict confidence, without the knowledge of its legislative authority.

It is said that the persons composing that provisional government, and supporting it, and represented by it, are Americans by birth, and that many of them retain their American citizenship. I suppose that is true. The dual citizenship which belongs to those persons under the peculiar condition of those islands is a citizenship conferred upon them by the express provision of the constitution of the kingdom of Hawaii, and in one of the official communications of Secretary Bayard, which will be found in the document laid before the Senate during his administration of the office of Secretary of State, it was expressly recognized and approved by him, doubtless by the direction of President Cleveland.

Now, unless I mistake the temper of those men, they will not yield the lawful government which they have established and which the whole civilized world has recognized, to one hundred or two hundred marines, acting under an unconstitutional and unlawful authority of the President of the United States. They have got something behind them which the Queen had not—the consciousness of a rightful cause, the knowledge that the true interests of that people and all its civilization are at stake; and it is not the wont and fashion of men of American birth and lineage to give up such a cause as that without a struggle. Then, according to the plain intimation of President Cleveland as to what he thinks his duty, there is war.

Now, Mr. President, I think it is manifest that this is a transaction which the Senate and the people are entitled to understand, and they are entitled to understand it without delay. If this thing has not been done yet, we want that the swift and indignant remonstrance of the American people shall make itself felt and shall be heard by Executive ears, however dull they may seem to be.

When President Grant proposed the plan, which he so honestly and so zealously approved, of initiating proceedings for the acquisition of San Domingo, he obtained, if I remember aright, legislative authority to send abroad his commission to inquire and ascertain the facts.

Now, was there any reason why President Cleveland should not have communicated to us at the late three-months session the fact that there was this trouble; that he feared the United States had done something wrong, or had made a mistake in the past, and asked for a fit and suitable legislative authority to have the facts ascertained?

I shall be curious to hear from any defender of the Administration on what precedents the Executive relies. I shall be curious to hear from him an explanation of this most extraordinary and most secret proceeding upon his part.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senator if it is not the fact that the personal representative of the President, whatever may have been his title—Paramount Extraordinary Blount perhaps—returned to this country before Congress adjourned at the extraordinary session?

Mr. HOAR. I am not sure, but I think that is true. The President of the United States, I suppose, had months ago all the information which this gentleman could give him.

I do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion in regard to the policy of annexing this distant territory to the United States. I do not wish to be understood now as entering into the discussion how far and on what condition and under what circumstances the United States may find it for the interest of both nations to establish, with the assent of Hawaii, a rightful and lawful protectorate there, or under what circumstances that group of islands may become a territory or dependency of the United States. All those questions are foreign to the present occasion.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the President of the United States is adopting and getting into the habit of adopting rather extraordinary language in his dealing with the other branches of Government when he tells us in his message after the history of the appointments, foreign and domestic, of the last six months, that Congress passed the civil-service law not because they thought it was right, but because they were afraid of popular opinion; and when he tells us that there is no serious doubt about this matter. He says this after the action of his predecessor, who never failed in courtesy to him, in the face of the utterances of the American press, in the face of what I believe to be the clear conviction and judgment of three-fourths of the American people, without distinction of party. I should like to be at liberty to relate to the President of the United States some things that I have heard said by Democrats in my part of the country, quite as honored and quite as distinguished and quite as high in the public esteem and confidence as any person holding any official position however illustrious. I think, I say, it is presumptuous when the President informs us that there can be no doubt—> that the constitutional government of Hawaii had been subverted with the active aid of our representative to that government, and through the intimidation caused by the presence of an armed naval force of the United States which was landed for that purpose.

That is in conflict with the declaration of the representative of the United States, an eminent and highly trusted citizen. It is in conflict with the fact that before those troops were landed the government buildings were in possession of the new government; and it is in conflict with the fact that the friends of the new government had at the moment (without saying anything about the difference of race or the habit of using weapons) the control and command of the larger portion of the military resources of that island; and it is in conflict with the public declarations of his predecessor. I should have no doubt whatever that if upon all the known facts, including the report of Mr. Blount, the question were submitted to this body, it would express a very different judgment from that of the Executive, and it would not be a party question.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I should much have preferred that this subject should have come up for discussion in the regular parliamentary method: that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] should have been referred to the appropriate committee, and that that committee should have thoroughly investigated the whole subject and made an exhaustive report to this body in order that we might intelligently proceed to the consideration of the grave question presented to us.

It has not been thought proper, however, by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to await that orderly procedure of this body; and while the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts calls for information, he proceeds to shell the woods before he obtains the information and to charge the President of the United States with meditating an act of war without the authority of the Congress of the United States, the sole repository of the authority to declare war in this country.

I deny the statement. I say that the Executive has respectfully submitted the question to Congress and given them the information at his disposal, such as he thought appropriate to submit in his message, and his action in this matter has been strictly confined within the limits of executive authority.

It is useless, Mr. President, to go beyond the question now legitimately presented for our consideration. The discussion of others will only tend to confuse that presented by the message.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has presented many views touching the question. He showed the importance of close relations between the Hawaiian Islands and the Government of the United States. He told us of the commercial advantages of the ownership and occupancy of those islands. He told us that the people are unfit for self-government; that corruption controls the enactment of their laws; that the Queen is immoral, and that the Christian people of the islands are behind the revolutionary government which has been established by the armed power of the Government of the United States; that the government overthrown was a monarchy and the one instituted is a republic; and that the President is meditating the overthrow of the republic and the reëstablishment of the monarchy.

It is not the first time in the world that a fraud attempts to justify itself by putting on the mask of morality and Christianity. The highest authority that we have on the subject of Christianity is the utterance of its founder when he said, "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." If the government were instituted by the Hawaiian people, half-civilized as they are, unfit for the government that we have, but if it were their government it was right that that government should be respected by the officers of the United States who were sent accredited to it. It makes no difference that it is a monarchy.

Cæsar was a monarch when Christ said that tribute should be paid to him. It is not a question of the immorality of the Queen and whether her character is such as Cæsar would have had his wife to possess. The only one presented is, did the Government of the United States interfere and overturn the existing Government of Hawaii? If they did, it is the duty of the people of the United States represented in this Government to make prompt restitution and reinstate the government which they have overthrown.

The Senator from Massachusetts said the government was established without violence. Yes, Mr. President, if the Senator was going along the road with $100 in his purse and 100 armed men should spring from the bushes and level their guns in his face and demand it from him and take it, there would be no bloodshed, and according to his definition no violence. His pocketbook would only pass in revolution and without violence from his pocket to the pockets of his moral and Christian robbers. What are the facts about this? Mr. President, the Hawaiian people have been the most unfortunate people of whom we have any history. Our history with them began in 1820, and it began with missionaries who went to spread the light of Christianity and to elevate them in the scale of civilization. They were proceeding in the good work and had made great progress when in 1839 the wealth of that country attracted the French, who sent an armed force to compel the people of the Hawaiian Islands to accept French brandy and French religion. After having robbed them they went away, and in 1843 an English officer in command of an English vessel came to the conclusion that it was an easy thing to do and he would seize the islands and place the flag of Great Britain over them. He did it; he tore down the Hawaiian standard and placed over the islands of the group the standards of Great Britain.

An English admiral went afterwards and removed the English ensigns and restored the Hawaiian standard, and, Mr. President, it is a beautiful picture that is presented in that act of restoration by the English officer. He set apart a day, summoned the whole people to assemble and see the act. They came along—men, women, and children—with tears streaming down their cheeks. The banners began to float, the cannon to thunder from the land, and the vessels in the port saluted with twenty-one guns the national flag as he removed the English flag and restored the rightful flag of the Hawaiian people, and in their great joy the good ship Constellation of the United States joined with twenty-one guns. That was much more honorable action than to have conspired with the men who used the flag and power of the United States to overturn that government, and then place it by the edict of our minister under the protectorate of the United States.

We are told that the President of the United States has no power over this question, but a minister of the United States, without the authority of Congress, can say, "I am the state." Strong as the great king who sat on the throne of France, he raises the flag of the United States over the Hawaiian flag and himself declares a protectorate. What authority had he to assume for the people of the United States that we would protect those islands not only against all foreign powers (for that is what a protectorate means, certainly in an American sense), but to protect it against the right of the people to alter, reform, or abolish their existing government and institute another in its stead if they thought that other more conducive to the security of their happiness? When did it become an American idea that we could go anywhere and compel a people with our bayonets to have any form of government that we wished and that they did not wish? It is a doctrine, sir, that has grown up within the last few years in this Government.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the proclamation of Minister Willis, published in the Evening Star at Honolulu, in which he says:

> The good order of this community will be kept undisturbed in the interests of humanity; that any attempt made by any person or persons to make trouble will be promptly checked and punished. You may put the matter more plainly and say that even if the Provisional Government discharged all its troops to-day no lawlessness would be allowed for one moment.
> No one need fear trouble and no lawlessness will be permitted.

Does the Senator, with whom I quite agree in what he seems to be advocating just now, tell the Senate where Minister Willis or the President of the United States, who instructs him, gets the power to keep order in Hawaii, and whether that is not itself an act of war on whatever government is the lawful one?

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I am not discussing at this time Mr. Willis's utterances. The Senator is taking me away from the subject which I am discussing.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator asks whether a certain doctrine was ever heard of, and I call his attention to the fact——

Mr. MILLS. And the Senator agreed with me.

Mr. HOAR. That President Cleveland through his agents, and through his diplomatic representatives, has just proclaimed it in the most offensive sense it can be put in, going very much beyond Mr. Stevens, and I ask him how he accounts for it, and to explain it, and whether he justifies it?

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. President, I will proceed. I do not know what Minister Willis has said to the Hawaiian people. I am dealing with authentic documents. I know that the ministers representing this or any other government have a right whenever their citizens can not be protected in a foreign port to assume that protection and preserve order so far as securing the lives and property of their own citizens, and I suppose that Minister Willis's language has reference to a fact of that kind.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to the fact that Mr. Willis does not say that. He says, "I shall keep order, and I shall punish anybody who violates the order of that community."

Mr. MILLS. My friend may put what construction he pleases on Minister Willis's language. I want to go back to Minister Stevens, and I want to get through with Minister Stevens before I touch on Minister Willis. If Mr. Willis has announced to the Hawaiian people or to the American people that the people of Hawaii have no right by revolution to alter, abolish, or reinstitute a government suited to their own will, he has announced a doctrine that has hitherto never found any hold upon the American people. What is our creed, Mr. President? I am afraid we are drifting away from it. Let me read from an old book, the very first page of our rules, the Declaration of Independence, the creed of the American people:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed;—

Not from foreigners, but from the governed—

> that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to affect their safety and happiness.

I claim that we announced a truth not for the American people alone, but we announced a truth that is universal. It is announced here, but announced for the benefit of the human family, that there can be no just government except it shall come from the consent of the governed, and that the "governed" at all times have a right to change, reform, abolish, and reinstitute whatever government they think proper to establish.

Sir, the President has been arraigned because he says that the Queen of those islands has been illegally deposed by armed forces of our Government, and that she is yet the legitimate Queen in that country, and we are told that he is instituting a monarchy. Unhappily, that language came from the lips of a Senator on the other side of the Chamber. We are to-day guarding a monarch in the Pacific Ocean. Three years ago we entered into a treaty with Great Britain and Germany, a triple alliance, contrary to the warning voice of the author of that Declaration of Independence against "all entangling alliances" with foreign people. This treaty was not made by Mr. Cleveland's Administration, or by any one appointed by or representing that Administration. It was negotiated under the Administration of President Harrison and by representatives appointed by him, and ratified by Senators who are now declaiming against monarchy.

We entered into a triple alliance to keep a king on the throne of the Samoan Islands, and in the execution of that treaty, which is to-day upon our statute books and which we are executing, we have aided in suppressing an armed insurrection against that king in the execution of the treaty, and we have helped to send off a rival who was striving, a pretender it may be, for that kingly throne, and he is to-day incarcerated in one of the Marshall Islands, and the Government of the United States is standing guard over that monarchy to support the throne of Malietoa.

That is not all, sir. We took possession of those islands with Great Britain and Germany and even made a tariff for them. They pay taxes, not according to the consent of the people of those islands, but they pay taxes according to the dictation of the armed power of the United States, Germany, and Great Britain, and the taxpayers of the United States have been contributing out of their pockets to pay the expenses of maintaining the monarchy. What has become of the old Revolutionary creed that taxation and representation go hand in hand? What has become of the doctrine of the inalienable right of self-government declared by our fathers to be the right of "all men"? Not only are we instituting and executing their tariff and other laws over their heads and against their consent, but the people of the United States are acting as jailors for the rival king who has been overthrown and incarcerated on another island. American bayonets are supporting the throne of one king and guarding the jail doors of another. All this was done by our friends of the other side, who are now so horrified at monarchy in Hawaii that they are willing to tear it down whether the people want it or not. It is nonsense to talk about the restoration of the Queen being the establishment of a monarchy by the United States. It is nonsense to talk about the military despotism established by the armed forces of the United States being a republican government. It lives upon the bayonets of the American troops. After the Government had been established it was found unable to support itself, and the Government so established, representing two or three thousand people out of 96,000, itself called upon Minister Stevens to protect and support it. It was unable to stand, and it is to-day unable to stand without the support of the United States.

How was that government overthrown, Mr. President? It is one of the singular things in history that a revolution should take place and a government possessing an army if not a navy—possessing an army and all branches of civil administration—should be overthrown without shedding a drop of blood, without an armed collision in its streets, without a battlefield. Is it not strange that it should surrender? Is it not something strange, yea, passing strange, that this Queen, with an army at her back, with an army in her palace grounds at the time of the revolution, with forts and places manned and armed, should have surrendered to those who had not a single gun to fire against it—not one?

It is something impossible to believe; and yet it was done; and it was done because the United States forces came upon the ground, and the Queen was told that if she resisted the insurgents she would declare war and wage war against the United States; and while the commander of her forces said he could drive the United States troops from the islands, he could not fight their 65,000,000 people; and some of the members of the committee on public safety advised her to yield under protest and appeal to the Government of the United States. She was reminded of the magnanimous conduct of the English admiral in 1843; that Great Britain did justice to her country, and asked if the people of the United States would not as readily render justice to her and restore her flag and her Government, and to these entreaties she yielded.

Mr. President, what was the necessity of Minister Stevens landing the forces at 4:30 o'clock, as Commander Wiltse said he did, on the 16th of January? I want to know what exigency made it necessary for the United States troops to land at that time? There was no disturbance. The people were as quiet as they are in New England on a Sunday morning when they are going to church. Why were those troops landed? Why did they go to the Government building, or to a building close to it, and within half pistol shot of that building, as some of the witnesses say, where they could command it with their arms? Why were the marines of the United States drawn up in line of battle with their guns trained upon the palace where the Queen had fifty soldiers to preserve order and protect life and property? Why did Capt. Wiltse tell his lieutenant that he would not permit any fighting in the streets? Why did Mr. Stevens refuse, on the application of the existing government, to aid in suppressing disorder and violence if that was in fact what he landed his troops for? And why did he refuse to aid her to maintain her government? When applied to by her for aid he said no; but he told the conspirators, "If you will go to the Government building, and if you will there proclaim that the Queen is deposed and organize a government, I will recognize you;" and at 2:30 o'clock the committee of public safety, consisting of 13 persons, 7 foreigners and aliens and 6 natives and naturalized people, went one after another to the Government building, afraid to go all together at once. They went by different streets, and before they went to the Government building to declare the Queen deposed they sent a messenger to see if anyone was there to hurt them. They were informed by their messenger that nobody was there, and that the business of the Government was proceeding quietly and orderly. Nobody dreamed of a revolution. One went by one street and another went by another street, and they slipped in and the Queen was deposed by the proclamation, and nobody knew it on the outside.

As soon as the Queen was deposed, then Minister Stevens recognized the revolutionary government, notwithstanding the Queen was there, with all her troops at the station-house, which was the arsenal and the place where the troops had concentrated and organized when former revolutions had been suppressed. More than 500 armed men were ready to suppress the insurrection, with the commanding officer saying he could easily do so and was ready to do it. In addition to that, he could successfully meet the troops of the United States and compel obedience to order and to the rightful authority of the Government, yet he could not fight all the troops of the United States that had not come upon Hawaiian soil. Conscious of his ability to suppress all disorder he refused to surrender until the Queen consented upon the entreaty of her advisers to surrender under protest to the arms of the United States. She was urged to surrender under protest to the United States Government and she surrendered to the United States Government, saying that she was not strong enough to cope with the armies of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him that it appears in evidence, if it is to be relied upon, that prior to the promulgation of the Provisional Government a committee of the members of the committee of safety applied to Mr. Stevens to know whether he would, in the event of the Queen's government attempting to arrest them, protect them from such arrest, and that he replied he would. That promise was extracted from Mr. Stevens before they proceeded to declare a new government.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. President, there have been various statements about the Queen's strength in the revolution and the number of her armed forces. I read as the most reliable from Secretary Foster. It is the most reliable because it is a statement against him. He was one of the principal movers in this annexation business, and he is stating his case most strongly for himself and for our friends on the other side. He says:

> On Saturday, the 14th of January, the capital was wholly controlled by the royal troops, including a large additional force of over 500 armed men not authorized by Hawaiian law.

Another statement shows that her regular force was equivalent to 500 men. Now, according to these statements, she had 1,000 men on that field, and those who instituted the new government, founded, it is pretended to be, upon the will of the people, had not one armed man on the islands when the revolutionists met on Monday. Yet the United States Government did nothing except to defend the consulate and legation! One of the strange things about it is, as Admiral Skerrett says, the position was well taken to support the Provisional Government, but very badly taken if it was the intention of the troops to defend the consulate and the legation. They were in a different part of the city; but here were these troops in line of battle right in the street, with their guns trained upon the palace, and ready to rain hail and desolation into the building. What a magnificent picture is presented by the representatives of 67,000,000 of the most powerful people on the globe with the muzzles of their guns upon a poor defenseless woman whose property is about to be stolen from her! And they tell us she is not a Christian and that the Christian people are not on her side!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Texas will please suspend. It is the duty of the Chair to announce that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution may be proceeded with until it is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution now before the Senate be proceeded with until it is disposed of.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is not that quite a large latitude? Had the Senator better not make that request to run during the remainder of the day? "Until disposed of" would mean indefinitely.

Mr. MILLS. I yield the floor if Senators object, and shall ask leave to resume my remarks to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object. I should like the Senator to go on.

Mr. MILLS. I know the Senator does not object.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have no objection to the Senator proceeding.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the Senator proceed without objection.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, the Senator may proceed without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the consideration of the resolution now pending before the Senate shall proceed. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLS. What a magnificent picture in our history, how entrancing it will be, how our children and our children's children will stand and gaze upon it, when some painter shall portray the scene for them, of this most powerful Republic, with power to cope with all the earth on its territory, standing with its guns shotted to the lips, trained upon the palace of a poor, half-civilized woman, who is the representative head of a weak and feeble people!

Why, Mr. President, has all this thing been done? Why has our minister been constantly informing his Government about the desirability of these islands? Why has he been writing letters telling us about how much sugar they produce, and what magnificent bananas hang from their trees? Why all this information about a country which did not belong to us? It reminds me of that incident in Roman history when Cato, who was after Carthage, took from the folds of his toga Carthagenian figs and laid them upon the table of the Roman Senate, and said, "This splendid fruit grows within three days' sail of Rome. Carthago delenda est." Carthage must fall because she produced fine figs which the Romans wanted. The Hawaiian Islands must belong to the United States because the sugar planters of Hawaii want to bring these islands in and obtain a bounty out of the pockets of American taxpayers.

The great trouble with the Hawaiian people began after our civil war, when adventurous and intelligent American people, and some Europeans, went upon these islands and discovered how rich were their lands and how productive they would be of sugar. A struggle ensued in 1874 for the vacant throne. The American sugar-growers espoused the cause of Kalakua and the other inhabitants espoused the cause of the rival claimant, Queen Emma. The Americans had Kalakua installed. They carried the legislature, which had the decision of the question, and Kalakua was installed. He was invited to the United States, and an armed vessel of the United States was sent to transport him to this country. I was a member of the other House when he was received in that body by Speaker Blaine and complimented on the fact that he was the first king from the West who had honored this country by a visit. There was not much said about his monarchy at that time. They were caressing him. Before he left the sugar reciprocity treaty was made here in Washington, and that reciprocity treaty permitted Hawaii to bring her sugar free into the United States, while everybody else was charged about 2 cents a pound. I denounced the act then on the floor of the House of Representatives as an act of plunder of the pockets of the American people.

What has it done for Hawaii? The Hawaiian people sent their sugar to the United States and sold it for the price of the sugar plus the tariff duty. The result of that was estimated in the sixteen years that the treaty was in force at fifty-one million and odd dollars to those planters, and they grew immensely rich. There was then no talk about annexation. But after the McKinley bill was passed, on the 1st of October, 1890, their sugar had to be sold in open competition with the sugar of the world here in the markets of the United States, and they lost that 2 cents bounty that had been given them. But we had given a bounty in the same bill to sugar producers in the United States of 2 cents a pound. Then, all at once, they cried aloud for annexation to the United States, that they might come in and be part of the territory and citizenship of the United States, in order to filch $5,000,000 annually out of the pockets of the people of the United States.

A very singular and very remarkable feature of this whole proceeding is that that revolution started on the 16th day of January, culminated on the 17th day of January, and on the 18th day of January the Provisional Government was recognized and the commissioners started to the United States to annex the islands and to make a treaty and get the bounty. It was done in a hurry. The thing must be done before the other Administration went out of power, and they were to have their hands up to their shoulders in the pockets of the people of the United States for their sugar.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MILLS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I think the statement which the Senator is making exceedingly unjust to the representatives of the existing government in Hawaii. I know, as a matter of fact, that in the treaty of annexation they not only did not ask that there should be any provision inserted that the sugar-raisers of those islands should receive a bounty, but I know further, as a matter of fact, that they said that they would be entirely content if a provision was inserted in the treaty that they should never receive any portion of the bounty which was paid by the United States.

Mr. MILLS. I do not know that I have it here, but if my friend will notice the letter that the commissioners wrote to our Government in proposing the terms of the treaty, he will see that they did want some bounty on sugar. I can not lay my hands on the letter at present, but I think I shall find it.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not say they did not wish for the bounty. It is natural for men to wish for all that they can get.

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. But I do say that their anxiety was for annexation to the United States, and that to achieve that annexation they were entirely willing to have inserted in the treaty itself a provision that no bounty should be paid.

Mr. MILLS. It is exceedingly strange, Mr. President, that with all that willingness to give up the whole purpose of the revolution—it was talked of in private, and yet it does not appear in public—when that treaty was made why was not a provision disclaiming the bounty inserted in the treaty between them and our Government? Instead of that we find them amply cared for in the very first provision of that treaty. Article I provides:

> The Government of the Hawaiian Islands hereby cedes, from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, absolutely and without reserve to the United States forever all rights of sovereignty of whatsoever kind in and over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, renouncing in favor of the United States every sovereign right of which as an independent nation it is now possessed; and henceforth said Hawaiian Islands and every island and key thereto appertaining and each and every portion thereof shall become and be an integral part of the territory of the United States.

Does not the sugar-bounty law go to every integral part of the territory of the United States? If somebody is raising sugar in Alaska, is he not entitled to the bounty? Would they not be entitled to the bounty on the islands of Hawaii, or of Vancouver, or of Cuba, or of Newfoundland if they were a part of the territory of the United States? It was carefully provided for here, and it was said in the revolutionary meeting—where they spoke in whispers with bated breath, for it seems that outsiders did not know what was going on in that meeting—that the McKinley bill had produced a serious condition of things in the islands. The testimony of the witnesses shows that it was the condition of the sugar-planting interests upon the islands which provoked the revolution, and that annexation began to be the cry of the sugar planters after the 1st day of October, 1890, when the McKinley bill passed and sugar was put upon the free list and Hawaiian interests fell. Then the Hawaiian planters began to suffer in their pockets, and then they began to desire to become "an integral part" of the territory of the United States in order that they might plunder the pockets of the people of the United States.

We are told that the Provisional Government is a republican government—a government boosted and upheld by American bayonets and living under the shadow of the muzzles of American cannon. If our Government will get out of the way and let the people exercise the same rights that we claim, and which our fathers claimed were inalienable in the Declaration of Independence, the right to institute whatever government they pleased, they will institute a government which will be in accordance with their will, and they will not submit to the dictation of this sugar oligarchy.

Mr. President, it is a singular fact, as shown in the testimony, that while the troops of the United States and its minister were ready to aid the revolutionary party in that commonwealth, they were there for the purpose of repressing, suppressing, and strangling every effort of the existing Government to maintain its life.

Mr. Stevens in his letters to his Government says two or three times that it was fortunate that the Boston was there to prevent insurrection and trouble at various times, and doubtless he told the truth. The Queen wanted to restore her Government back to her people.

The people of Hawaii had their first constitution in 1840, adapted to their then condition. In 1852 they made another.

In 1864 still another. In all these constitutions the Queen appointed the nobles to one branch of her legislature and the Hawaiian people elected the others; but in 1884, under the lead of Mr. Thurston, the constitution of 1864 was overthrown and a constitution was adopted with a property qualification of $3,000. A property qualification was adopted for the nobles and for the voters of the nobles, which rendered it impossible for anybody except the sugar barons to get into the house of nobles, and from that time they controlled the Government and disfranchised the great body of the Hawaiian people, nine-tenths of whom were disfranchised.

The Queen proposed, in response to the repeated requests and importunate entreaties of her people, to restore the constitution and reënfranchise her people, and she agreed that she would do it. It is said that it was a revolutionary act; and it was. All the constitutions provided that they should be amended by the legislature; that amendments should be proposed and passed by one legislature; considered by the people, and repassed by another; but this was never enforced in a single one of the revolutions.

That was the provision in the constitution of 1864; and yet Mr. Thurston, the leader of this revolutionary movement, with his colleagues framed a constitution and compelled the King to take it in 1887, without going through the forms of law. If the people submitted to it, it was their constitution in the first case, and if they submitted it was their constitution in the second, and it would have been equally their constitution in the third.

What have we to do with it here? What have we to do with the question whether that constitution was formed in accordance with the existing law or not? Absolutely nothing. If we still maintain the right, as proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence, that every people have a right to institute their own government, then we have no right at all to interfere with that government.

It was this constitution of 1887 which took the ballot away from the Hawaiian people, which disfranchised the Hawaiian people, which gave control to the sugar interests of those islands and the government which they dominated after 1887. It was this government, against which the Hawaiian people protested, and for the amendment of which the Queen proposed the new constitution. When that was proposed, Mr. Stevens uncovered his powerful arm and threw his powerful sword into the scale and said: "Weigh that." In these perilous times the question was asked, "What will Mr. Stevens do?"

The Queen, poor and powerless, when matched against him, sat upon her rude throne and with her counselors around her asked, "What will Minister Stevens do; what will Minister Stevens say; what will Commander Wiltse do?" And every time they were asked by the existing government, "Will you do anything to aid us to maintain our authority and suppress any insurrection started against our government?" they received a baptism of ice water; but whenever any one said, "If we can get possession of one of the government buildings, if we can slip in in the quiet, in the cool of the evening, with no one knowing anything about it, if we can read in whispers the declaration deposing the Queen and destroying her government, will you protect us against her arms and her power and her people?" they said "yes" beforehand.

Here is a minister of the Government of the United States meeting with insurrectionists and conspirators to overthrow a government to which he was accredited and saying to them, "If you will do so and so, if you commit treason against your government, if you will depose your sovereign, I will stand by and guard you with the muzzles of the guns of the United States, and if your sovereign dares to come upon the ground I will riddle her palace over her head and destroy her troops." According to the statement of the witnesses our troops were so disposed that, if the troops of the Queen attempted to fire upon the insurrectionists, they would fire into the bosoms of the United States troops, and if the United States troops had attempted to fire, they would fire into the Queen's forces.

Here stands a commander of armed forces saying by his conduct, "I have not landed here for the purpose of preserving order; I have not landed here for the purpose of securing the life and property of the people; I intend to see that there shall be no fighting here." How could the Queen maintain her throne, how could that Government support itself, how could that people exercise the inalienable right to institute a government for themselves when the forces of the United States stand with their fuses lighted, and their guns trained and ready to send death and a desolating hail upon her palace, her army, and her people? Yet we hear upon the floor of the American Senate that there was no violence attendant on the introduction of this new government, that it was a peaceable, quiet affair, all orderly, and after it was all over Mr. Stevens writes to the Government of the United States, "All is profound peace and quiet here."

The Czar of Russia, after he had dismembered and desolated Poland and after his victim had expired in the bloody dust of Warsaw and her wretched people who had survived were on the road to the mines and caves of Siberia, congratulated the people that "order now reigns in Warsaw." Yes, order reigned in Hawaii, and it was the order of robbery; it was an act disgraceful to the Government of the United States, and Mr. Cleveland rose to the full stature of an American citizen and an American President when he said that the honor of the people of the United States demands that full restitution shall be made.

Mr. President, if we had gone on the island of Vancouver or Newfoundland and raised the flag of the United States it might not have been an act of great magnanimity for us to have taken it down again. We would have been compelled to take it down, because there was a power behind the rightful flag that represented a rightful government, which would have forced us, with whatever expenditure of blood and money, to take down the flag where it was not rightfully hung. But when you come to consider a poor people who have nestled, like the ewe lamb of Nathan, in our bosom, who have depended upon us for years for our friendship, and when an American minister, in the spirit of a filibuster and a buccaneer, goes to these islands, seizes them by the force of the arms placed in his possession, it will be an exhibition creditable to the Government and people of the United States to render justice to that poor, weak, and feeble people.

What course had the President left to him when he saw the facts laid before him, that the minister and the naval commander of the United States had seized those islands illegally, without authority, in violation of the neutrality laws, and in violation of the honor and integrity of the people of the United States, but to restore the Government to the people from whom it had been torn by this act of violence as far as it was in his power?

It is not in his power, Mr. President, to wage war against those people. He has not claimed that it was in his power. I am not afraid that he is going to open fire upon the supporters of the Provisional Government from the vessels in the harbor. I am not afraid that he is going to march our troops through the streets of Honolulu and depose this conspiracy which calls itself a provisional government and restore the Queen. That will require an act of Congress. Whatever power is placed in his hands as an Executive he can exercise, and has exercised. He has said that the Government was overthrown by the United States forces; that he has taken down the flag and put it where it belongs, on the decks of American vessels; he has removed the marines to their place on the quarter decks of the American vessels. He has said that the Queen is the rightful sovereign of the Government and was illegally deposed, not by her people, not by a revolution, but deposed by foreign aid and foreign power, wielded at the instance of the accredited minister of our Government. That is all the President can do. In doing it I doubt not that he reflects the sentiment of all the fair-minded people of the United States.

I know, Mr. President, how strong the sugar ring is. Out of some thirty thousand laborers on the islands, twenty-five thousand, in round numbers, are engaged in the cultivation of sugar. Twenty corporations, I believe, control over $20,000,000 of sugar values. Twenty-five million dollars' worth is American; some are private estates, and out of about thirty-nine or forty million dollars of value invested in those islands three-fourths of it is in sugar estates. The companies have interests all over that part of the United States where large capital lives. The stock is held all over the country. The people of the United States have large sugar interests in Hawaii. It is United States capital which has gone and bought the sugar estates. It was United States capital that compelled the negotiation of the treaty in 1876, and passed it through the Senate. It is United States capital which has obtained the bounty of $51,000,000 in the last sixteen years as the result of that treaty. It is nineteen hundred and some odd Americans on these islands out of ninety-six thousand people who are behind this movement.

Mr. President, I do not pretend to deny the superiority of the people of the Saxon race. I know very well that they have taken control and governed every country where they have come in contact with its people and where they are strong enough to do it. I know it is a question of time when they will take the Islands of Hawaii; it is a question of time when they will take everything else. If our Government lives and keeps together and continues to grow and expand and multiply its power and its civilization, it will take everything with which it comes in contact; but, in God's name, let us do it decently and in order. Let us wait until the time comes when we grow numerous enough and by the power of our numbers and of our intellect control the inferior populations among whom we live and build up government adapted to our condition; but the idea of thirteen gentlemen, seven of them foreigners, owing no allegiance to the Government of Hawaii, instituting a government under the muzzles of the guns of the Government of the United States, and by threats and intimidation compelling the Queen to abdicate, and appealing to the people of the United States to indorse the act, is something that ought to be humiliating to the American people.

To see queens coming to Congress and appealing for their rights; to see princesses—because we had a Hawaiian princess—coming here and pleading for their rights, takes us back to the old days of the Romans, when conquered queens were chained behind chariots and led through the streets, weighed down with golden chains, to adorn the triumphs of conquerors who had overthrown them. Is that day coming when along Pennsylvania avenue we shall see a Hawaiian queen, not loaded with golden chains, but weighed down with sugar sacks on her back, coming to the Congress of the United States pleading in behalf of her poor, miserable, ignorant people for the right that we claim to have come direct from God to us, inalienable in its nature—the right to institute a government for themselves?

Mr. President, this appeal is made to us upon the strongest grounds that an appeal can be made to any free people. The weakest people on the globe is appealing to the most powerful, and appealing simply for a right which we have said over and over again, and read from all our platforms and in all our churches and on all our highways on the Fourth of July—the creed that is to live forever among our people. The appeal to us is for the enjoyment of the right to institute their own government, to alter, reform, or abolish it at their pleasure and institute another in its stead—the sacred right of self-government. The appeal is for the right of the governed to institute the government which they must support and whose laws are to be enforced upon them.

If we have not been false in all our teachings, if we have not been deceitful with ourselves, if we have not been playing the hypocrite, if we have been sincere in our teachings when we appealed to the deliberate judgment of the civilized world, if we have been in earnest in laying down this imperishable dogma of freedom in all lands, we should disclaim the action of our minister and our naval forces, and restore the Government that we overthrew.

I want to know, Mr. President, if this Queen was rightfully deposed, if she is no longer Queen, if the constitution has been strangled, if the Government is dead, if it has no legal existence and no legal claim, why in the treaty which was made between these conspirators and the representative of the United States there was a provision inserted that the taxpayers of the United States shall pay her an annuity of $20,000 as long as she lives? If that young princess has no right, if the Government of which she is a part is gone, if a new Government has come, if her rights have been confiscated and destroyed, why is it that this treaty provides that she shall be paid $150,000? Ah, Mr. President, remorse has been about the hearts and consciences of some of these people.

Here is recognition that they have done a great wrong; here is a recognition of rights slaughtered and trampled in the dust by a ruthless and irresistible foreign power; here was a confession of the wrong, and that we ought, in the sight of God and an enlightened and intelligent humanity, to do something to recompense these people for the wrongs which we have inflicted upon them; here is a confession of title; here is a confession of a right overthrown; here is a confession in these papers of a wrong committed. As American citizens, proud of our own country, a people ready to resist to the death the interference of any people on the face of the earth or all the people on the face of the earth, in our domestic concerns or our right of self-government, it behooves us to grant to these poor people that which we claim for ourselves, "to do unto others as we would have others do unto us;" and while we are taking the vail of Christianity to cover this monstrosity, let us remove the vail from before our eyes far enough to see the great truths taught by the great author of Christianity.

It is no part of the argument connected with the question submitted by the President to investigate whether or not our own self-preservation requires us to take these islands. Mr. Marcy's letters have been read, and the treaty negotiated with Mr. Marcy has been read, to show that he was in favor of annexing these islands, and that the Administration of which he was a member was in favor of it. Mr. Marcy represented, and perhaps that Administration represented, a large element of the American people, aggressive, adventurous; you may call them filibusterers, for in his day filibustering was a distinguished element of our population.

Mr. Marcy not only was after Hawaii, but he was after Cuba; and Mr. Marcy sent to the representatives of our Government in Europe, James Buchanan, Pierre Soulé, and John Y. Mason, and told them to meet at Ostend and confer upon the subject. They met at Ostend and addressed a letter to Mr. Marcy, in which they set forth the advantages of purchasing Cuba, the advantages to Spain of selling Cuba, and the advantages to us of the occupation of Cuba. Then they said that self-preservation was the first law of nature, and if, by reason of the refusal of Spain to sell at a price largely more than the value of the island, it became necessary for us, we would be justified in taking the island and paying for it on the same principle that a man would be justified in tearing down a burning house by the side of his own to save his own, upon the principle that self-preservation was the first law of nature: declaring that it was the key of the Gulf of Mexico, as Jefferson said it was in 1802, and as he said to Napoleon Bonaparte, through Minister Livingston, that the nation which owned the mouth of the Mississippi was the declared enemy of the people of the United States, and it was only a question of time when they would take it. Yet in 1856 our friends, who are so anxious to enforce the filibustering business to-day, in the Republican platform, when that party was in its youth, declared that the doctrine of the Ostend manifesto was the doctrine of highwaymen; and it did look a good deal that way. This is their declaration:

Resolved, That the highwayman's plea that "might makes right," embodied in the Ostend circular, was in every respect unworthy of American diplomacy, and would bring shame and dishonor upon any government or people that gave it their sanction.

Mr. GRAY. What are you reading from?

Mr. MILLS. I am reading from the Republican platform of 1856.

Mr. Marcy was stretching out on the one hand to seize Hawaii and with the other hand he was stretching out to seize Cuba. Cuba lay at our door and guarded the vast commerce which went down the tributaries of the Mississippi River and emptied into the ocean. The Republicans declared that the Monroe doctrine when applied to Cuba was the doctrine of a highwayman, and yet when the armed forces of the United States seized the Hawaiian Islands, put the United States flag over them, and declared a protectorate over them, making the United States responsible for them, that that is wise policy, that that is a highly moral and highly Christian policy, and they have brought the ministers of religion here to prove that this is in accordance with the teachings of Christ!

If one is right the other ought to be right. If the doctrine of the Ostend manifesto was the doctrine of highwaymen, that might makes right, then the doctrine of Mr. Stevens, when he overthrew the Government of the Hawaiians and instituted a government of his own and supported that government with the bayonets of the United States until Mr. Blount removed them under the directions of the President, must have been the doctrine and the practice of highwaymen.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there is nothing for us to consider but whether the Government of the United States did take any part in the overthrow of the established Government of the Hawaiian Islands. If it did, and if that Government was overthrown by our armed forces, which it was, then both honor and justice demand that restitution shall be made, as much so as honor and justice would demand if we had taken the property of another, and especially of a weak people, who could not resent or resist—that we should make restitution of the property which we had wrongfully taken.

Mr. President, I confidently rely on the good judgment and quickened conscience of the American people, when they shall have heard all the facts in relation to this revolution, wrought by the armed forces and under the direction of the minister of the United States and not by the people of Hawaii, to say that full restitution shall be made for the wrong we have done, and the Government of the Hawaiian people shall be reinstated and that we will not destroy their independence, nor permit any other government to do it.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I should like to take part at some time in the dicussion of this question, but it seems to me that it is due to all of us before a discussion proceeds, from which enlightenment of the people and benefit to ourselves and to the country should follow, that we ought to be in a position to deal with the facts and to know what are the trustworthy evidences of facts.

There can be nothing more desirable to the proper understanding of this question than the utmost fullness and completeness of information, and I desire most particularly that everything which is asked for in this resolution, and much more besides, shall be furnished to this body to enable our discussion of this question to proceed upon an intelligent basis.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that there are reasons why we ought not at this moment to adopt this resolution. In his message, read but the day before yesterday, the President made but a brief statement of his general position in reference to Hawaiian affairs. He said:

Additional advices are soon expected. When received they will be promptly sent to the Congress, together with all other information at hand, accompanied by a special Executive message fully detailing all the facts necessary to a complete understanding of the case, and presenting a history of all the material events leading up to the present situation.

Mr. President, in view of that complete and ample proffer of information, which in the general terms employed would seem inevitably to comprehend all that this resolution specifically seeks, it occurs to me that it is a more dignified course for this body to pursue to defer making a request of the President, which, in the very terms in which it is made, defers until such time as he shall see fit to send the information we seek. It would be unreasonable to presume that the President would see fit to send forward some special items of information when he is contemplating bringing to the knowledge of this body the full and ample stock, in every aspect in which the subject can be considered, which he has at hand, and upon which he will stand for the proof of the facts and the wisdom of his action.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the information already accorded by the President contains the instructions under which the minister to Hawaii is now acting or proposes to act?

Mr. VILAS. I presume the Senator from Delaware is as well advised as the rest of us that the information which we individually possess in respect of this subject we hold now under the seal of confidence.

Mr. HIGGINS. But we can say what it does not contain. Further, I do not know that any confidence has been reposed in us.

Mr. VILAS. I do not understand that a confidence is to be preserved by answering questions in the negative, for a shrewd inquirer will very soon, by the process of reductio ad infinitum, find out what he desires.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that Mr. Blount's report was published in the New York Herald weeks ago by the instrumentality of a Mr. Nordhoff, as I understand.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts could only understand that extra-officially from a source of information which he ought not to weigh in a discussion of this kind. We are entitled to have official information. We are advised by the President that, for the purpose of acquiring knowledge of the facts, he sent an accredited commissioner to these islands to seek for trustworthy information, avoiding the confusion of newspaper discussion and newspaper correspondence, which we all know is so liable to be colored by partisanship or particular interests. That information we ought to be able to employ and use in our discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VILAS. With great pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator what assurance we have, and what assurance the country has that, pending the information which may be sent to us in the President's own time, some act may not be committed by the representatives of the United States which would commit this country to a policy of which Congress and the people of the country would not approve?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, this body of the people of the United States have the assurance that the Executive whom they chose will discharge his duty in the same manner in which he has in the past, with fidelity to his convictions, with courage, with uprightness and sincerity of purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Wisconsin contend that the policy to be pursued by the United States as to our relations with foreign countries in the matter of interference in their domestic affairs, or as to some overt act of war, is a question for the President of the United States alone to determine?

Mr. VILAS. That subject is one which we shall discuss at length, but is utterly foreign to the observations that for the time being I am making. The suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island is not apt in any respect, for the reason that this proposed inquiry leaves the question of answer to it to the discretion of the President himself. It is a matter as to which the question suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island does not intervene. The President, in proper, respectful, and due official consideration of this body, need not answer this resolution at all. Therefore the inquiry into the question of whether it belongs to Congress or the President to determine the method with which the Government of Hawaii shall be treated is not a consideration which applies to the resolution now under discussion.

There is another circumstance to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, for I can affirm that no man can more desire than those upon this side of the Chamber desire the fullest and most complete illumination of the facts and from the most trustworthy sources of evidence; but at this time it happens that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is absent; that he who stands second upon that committee in the arrangement which the Senate made of it is also absent, and therefore the committee is not in a position to consider this question at this moment in the manner which is customary.

I would not in the least make a motion or propose a step which did not consider the right of every Senator to information full and complete, and all the usual methods by which it can be obtained; but under the circumstances it seems to me that the inquiry to the President should be pretermitted and that at some later day it should be made.

We can not discuss this question except upon some supposititious case. It is easy to put it, and it may be that it would be no breach of confidence to put it. The Senator from Massachusetts has seen fit to say that the President is making an act of war upon Hawaii.

Suppose it should be disclosed when the facts come to be known that Hawaii was at peace; that no step had been taken in the conduct of the public affairs of that nation which involved or had produced one single trivial act in breach of the peace, and yet at the request of a body of men who were but in part American citizens the minister of the United States, assuming some authority of which I do not know the origin, ordered troops upon the soil of the Hawaiian Kingdom, and so placed those troops that they were drawn up across the street from the government house of the Hawaiian Kingdom; and suppose it should turn out that he did this in confederacy with people resident in Hawaii, of whom but a portion were citizens of that Government and the rest strangers or foreigners prosecuting their individual courses with the authority or under the permission of that Government; and confederating with these he stood that body of people living there upon the platform of defense furnished by the troops of the United States, and then with the military power of the United States at its back a committee which had demanded beforehand of the minister of the United States his guaranty of protection read their proclamation that they were the Government of Hawaii and took possession of that island, with which we were at peace, and that they deposed the very constitution and the constituted authorities which have been made the pretext of objection, and thereby backed up by the minister of the United States, by the cannon of the United States, by the troops of the United States, they demanded the surrender of the Queen with her insufficient power, and thereupon she yielded, declaring her submission only to the power of the United States and her entire ability to suppress any insurrection in her own kingdom. Suppose——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose that every circumstance which the Senator has been picturing were absolutely true and confessed to be true on both sides of the Chamber, does that create any reason why the President of the United States should not take the American people sufficiently into his confidence to state what instructions he has given to a person who is properly presumed to be their representative as much as his?

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Rhode Island interrupts me when I am answering a suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts with a question utterly irrelevant and completely answered by the President's own message in the clause I have already read, in which he has promised the amplest information to the people of the United States on the subject.

Mr. HOAR. When he has got through?

Mr. VILAS. As soon as he can deal with the subject, upon information soon to be obtained. But I was about to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if such should turn out to be the facts in this case, when was the act of war leveled at the Hawaiian kingdom?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer the question with great pleasure.

Mr. VILAS. I will ask the Senator, then, if it was not an act of war to land the troops there and overthrow the Government by virtue of their force?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator asks me the question I will answer it with immense satisfaction to myself. Whether it will be satisfactory to him I do not know.

There is no pretense that there was any act of force. Troops were landed. They were landed under the allegation that they were to be used to protect the lives and property of the American citizens. If the Queen was really yielding to those troops and not to the armed insurrection, there was nothing easier than for her to inquire of the American minister, who was within about 20 rods of her, or thereabouts, all the time, whether those troops were to be permitted to assail her or to prevent her from maintaining herself. She did not do it. So the mere fact is that those troops were landed under the declaration of a peaceful and lawful purpose and in accordance with law among nations, and without putting the question, without going so far to require the discharge of a musket or the presenting of a musket toward the Hawaiian Government, at once said, "I yield." There is not an instance in all history where a government was overthrown under such circumstances and was yielding to the force of another power. But now let me put the question——

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question right there, before he leaves that point? He spoke of the Queen yielding to an armed insurrection. What information has he that there was an armed insurrection there on the 16th of January?

Mr. HOAR. The statement of Mr. Stevens and the statement of the Provisional Government that they had the superior armed force at the time.

Mr. GRAY. There is not a bit of evidence of that.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. VILAS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that he is not at all answering my question. He is begging it. He is asserting a state of facts contrary to the state of facts upon which I put the supposititious question. He is assuming that certain things exist, and I am asking him what will be his answer if the contrary proves to be the truth, if the facts as I state them should be disclosed and be convincing upon the testimony?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. VILAS. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. If it were true that twelve months ago, in violation of right and of international law, the Government of the United States, or some official of the United States, misrepresenting the Government in Hawaii, had done that thing; and a government had been changed and had been in peaceful possession of its power during the interval of twelve months, and the Government of the United States in full knowledge of the facts had recognized the new Government, and the President of the United States had sent a letter to it addressed to my great and good brother, Mr. Dole, I say that it would be an act of infamy for the President of the United States by the same messenger to send an inquiry as to what had been done in the past and to send instructions to overthrow the Government. It would be an act of infamy only paralleled by the act of Joab when he stabbed his neighbor under the fifth rib and said, "Art thou in health, my brother?"

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts appears in almost the same instant in two very unsatisfactory characters, as a reluctant and a too-willing witness. He does not answer the question which he said he would answer, and he proceeds to testify with volubility in respect to an entirely different state of facts. The question put to the Senator from Massachusetts was whether, if the troops were landed there under the circumstances I suggested, and the revolution was accomplished by their force applied directly or indirectly, it was the commission of an act of war? That was the question.

Mr. HOAR. That would depend on the question whether such an act was authorized by the Government. If a United States official did that thing and the President of the United States did not so understand it, but he reported something else, I do not at all conceive that it would be the duty of the United States six months afterwards to overthrow the existing condition of things.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to finish the sentence? The whole argument of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Texas would require us to give back Texas to Mexico to-day.

Mr. MILLS. The United States did not get Texas from Mexico. Texas came into the Union voluntarily.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Massachusetts flies from the defense of his own proposition. It was his proposition that here was an act of war, to be levied by the President of the United States, and he is declaring it without permitting the use of the evidence, which we hold under the seal of confidence, to show that the facts entirely overthrow it and prove the act of war to have originated under Minister Stevens and during a preceding Administration in this country.

But let me put a still further question to the Senator from Massachusetts in respect to his assertion about the act of war. Suppose under the circumstances I have mentioned it happened that the Queen of the Hawaiian Islands, supported by all her native subjects almost without exception, trusted and beloved by them, with the Government of which she was the head recognized as their Government, should yield to the demand made by the minister of the United States through his confederates for a surrender to the force of the United States and put that surrender in writing, in which he said, "I have entire command of all my troops, of all my powers, of all the places of this Government; I can suppress this little insurrectionary force on the instant, but I can not contend with the United States; if it be true, as is alleged, that the United States takes this position, I must yield; but distrusting the truth of it, I yield only upon condition that it shall be referred to the Government at Washington to inquire into the truth of this controversy and the justice and wisdom of this demand. Suppose that the insurgents, advised by the minister of the United States and fortified by the troops behind him, accept the condition and the Queen turns over the Government, not to a body of insurgents whom she could have trodden out with her forces, but to the power of the United States and in confiding submission to the justice of the United States to whom she yielded the question——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to put him a question?

Mr. VILAS. No; let me finish. Then will the Senator from Massachusetts say that when the Government of the United States decides that question of submission it is engaged in an act of war upon the very people who accepted it and agreed to abide by the result?

Mr. HOAR. Now, allow me to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VILAS. I should like to have the Senator answer whether that is an act of war.

Mr. HOAR. It is, in my opinion.

Mr. VILAS. An act of war?

Mr. HOAR. It is as flagrant an act of war the President is now proposing to do as can be. Going in in pursuance of such a pretense as that, and undertaking to preserve social order, saying that anybody will be punished who disturbs the peace, as Minister Willis seems to have said under his instructions, is an act of war. Now, I have answered that question.

Mr. GRAY. What does the Senator think of Mr. Stevens?

Mr. HOAR. I am not talking about Mr. Stevens.

Mr. GRAY. No; I do not believe you are.

Mr. HOAR. I am answering the question. The Senator from Wisconsin puts me a question about the present act of Minister Willis and the present Administration, and the Senator from Delaware seems to think it is a subject of taunt that I do not talk about Mr. Stevens. I am answering a question, and I have answered it. Now, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, suppose everything he has said is true, and every supposition he has made is sound, where does the President of the United States get his authority to do anything to right that wrong, if it be a wrong, without the consent of Congress, and to use the Army and Navy of the United States to do it? Will the Senator answer that question? Where is the authority for it in the President?

Mr. VILAS. The question which the Senator from Massachusetts puts is a question to which I hope at a future time to address some observations, fully, completely meeting it, at least so far as my judgment goes.

Mr. HOAR. Answer it; I can hear the Senator now.

Mr. VILAS. But at this point, precisely what I am saying is that we are not equipped to argue the question which is presented. We have not the facts at command to argue the question. Precisely what we want is a knowledge of the facts upon which we can argue the question.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator for his construction of the Constitution of the United States, not for the facts.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, for what the President of the United States has done, for what the President of the United States has instructed his minister to do, he has ample and complete and perfect authority.

Mr. CULLOM. What is it?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Wisconsin is going to answer it in the future, but will he at this moment, if he can, imagine a state of facts under which the President of the United States has the constitutional authority to instruct Mr. Willis to go to Hawaii and preserve order and punish breaches of the peace when there is a de facto government there?

Mr. VILAS. I am under no necessity whatever to inquire into any question concerning an exercise of power by the President to send anybody to Hawaii to keep the peace or to keep the public order there. I have no idea the President has done anything of the kind, except as I learn in some way (perhaps I may say that, because I may have heard it outside of confidential information), that there was an attempt on the part of an American minister once to put troops on the island of Hawaii with a view of keeping the public peace there and discharging in that island, not the duty which the United States owes to citizens of the United States, but the duty which the peaceful Government of Hawaii owed to the citizens of that country.

But, Mr. President, I had no purpose to engage in any extensive discussion of the matter at this time. I was merely putting to the Senator from Massachusetts a question which I supposed he would freely answer at once affirmatively, whether upon the state of facts which I suppose to have existed an act of war had been committed on Hawaii, not by the President of the United States, but under the former President of the United States, by the minister clothed with the authority of this Government then resident in that island.

I desire explicitly to disclaim any idea of discourtesy to the Senator from Massachusetts, and explicitly to disclaim any want of willingness to have the full information presented. I seek it always, but because of the reasons which I have suggested I think before this resolution is sent to the President the Committee on Foreign Relations ought to consider it in view of the peculiar circumstances. I therefore make a motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not propose to cross the Hawaiian bridge until we get to it. I do not propose to discuss the wisdom of the original procedure on the part of Minister Stevens or the wisdom of what has been recently done by the present Administration. I do not understand that those questions are involved in the pending resolution.

I seldom agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] states, but I do agree with him in this particular, viz, that this is an ordinary and simple resolution asking for information from a department of the Government in reference to a most important matter. It is information which I think the American people wanted to ascertain from the President's message, and they were disappointed in the information not being furnished.

The question as to what has been done is the point involved. When we ascertain what instructions have been given and when we understand what the true situation was at the commencement of the difficulty, we can then determine what we ought to do.

I listened to the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], or at least a portion of it. I did not understand that he opposed the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MILLS. No, I did not.

Mr. HILL. The Senator did not. I therefore assume that he recognizes the propriety of the passage of the resolution.

I do not propose to debate the question day after day for the purpose of allowing the Administration an opportunity to accomplish a certain result, so that thereafter the Congress of the United States may be powerless to apply whatever remedy it may see fit to adopt. Delay may be dangerous.

It is objected by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] that the passage of the pending resolution at this time will be a sort of discourtesy to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I should be the last one here to suggest any discourteous act toward the distinguished chairman of that committee [Mr. MORGAN] or any of his associates, but I do not understand (although this is a very courteous body and understood so to be throughout the country) that there is anything improper for a Senator to propose a resolution involving the subject of foreign affairs and to press it in the absence of the chairman or in the absence of any one member of that committee.

No action is proposed except the bringing of desired information into this Chamber. That is all. What the Senate may see fit to do when that information shall be furnished is another and a different subject altogether. I therefore say that it is begging the question on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin to insinuate that there is some sort of discourtesy to the chairman of the committee by pressing the resolution at this time, and I think it affords him simply an opportunity to occasion delay in order that Congress may be powerless to take proper action in a certain event.

Mr. President, I have no reflections to cast upon the preceding Administration or upon the present Administration. I have no unkind word to utter in reference to the action of the previous minister or the present minister. We have a disputed state of facts as to what actually took place when the former government of Hawaii was overthrown. There is a dispute between the previous minister and the gentleman (Mr. Blount) who was sent to investigate the subject—sent not by Congress, but by the President alone. We have his statements. We have the statements of the previous minister. There is a disputed question of fact. Congress in its discretion may see fit to send a duly authorized commission to that Government to ascertain the true situation. Congress may conclude in its wisdom that it is proper to send more than one person for the purpose of ascertaining the true facts in regard to this matter.

The point that I make now is simply this: The President has informed us in his message that there has been given on the part of the Administration certain instructions as to what should be done. It is argued by some people that those instructions are of a pacific character, that something is to be accomplished by negotiation. It is said that the Provisional Government is to be undermined, perhaps by intrigue; that the people who are behind it are to be induced to surrender the Government they now control. Those means are pacific. Possibly the President has a right to give those instructions, and then again he may not. Other instructions, of a different character, are hinted at in the public press. I do not say they have been given. I hope they have not been given; but it is said that other instructions have been authorized, from which it is inferred that force may be used to restore the previously existing status. This brings up the question as to whether the present Administration or the President has the right, without the consent of Congress, by the use of the Army or the Navy of the country, to restore the previously existing status, even conceding that the present Government had been placed there by fraud, or even by force.

There are three departments of this Government, and the executive department is but one of them. We ask this information because we are entitled to it. We ask it now.

It is suggested that whether the President will comply with the resolution depends upon his own judgment and his own discretion. The resolution is so worded. It is respectfully worded. He can withhold this information if he desires. I can not imagine any good reason why it should be withheld from this body for a single moment after the resolution shall reach the White House.

Does any Senator around this circle intimate or suggest that there may be some special reason why the public interests will be jeopardized by having the Congress of the United States in possession of all the facts? What harm is to be done if this body shall know and the people shall know precisely what is now going on upon that unfortunate island? I suggest that no good reason has been presented or can be presented why the President should not promptly comply with the resolution.

For myself I see no actual necessity for the insertion of the words that he shall inform us in case he thinks the public interests will not be jeopardized; but, sir, it is well that the resolution should pursue the ordinary method. It is well that there should be no departure in this instance from the usual customary form of language used. Nevertheless I say no good reason exists why the information should not be furnished immediately.

Mr. President, there are reasons why the information should be given here and now. Perhaps at this very hour the Navy of the United States, cooperating with our American minister, may be seeking to destroy the Provisional Government by force, and I say the propriety of such action is a question to be determined by the Congress of the United States and by no one else and by no other authority. Therefore, sir, the public interests demand that we should have this information.

I do not desire to intimate that the actual instructions, whatever they are, are improper. I do not say they are unauthorized, because I know not what they are in fact. Senators may argue one side and they may argue the other. We may say that the President has done right and others may say he has done wrong. None of us know what he has done. The resolution simply says that he shall inform Congress what are those instructions. Are they to require our minister to negotiate for the destruction of the Provisional Government by intrigues, by negotiation, or by some arrangement, or have no instructions whatever been given of that character? Or has our minister been instructed to restore the existing status by putting the Queen back upon the throne?

There is no substantial objection to the pending resolution. Gentlemen may want time here for the purpose of allowing the instructions to be carried into effect by our minister, so that Congress may be powerless to remedy the wrong, because no other reason can be given here for delay. I think that nothing whatever should be done by our Navy or our minister until Congress shall have possession of all the facts, and I regret that the President of the United States did not see fit in his message to give us the instructions. Every other fact in regard to this transaction was given, every material matter of information relating to this whole transaction which we ought to know was given. Not the details, but the substance of it, has been furnished us and furnished to the people; but when it came to what is going to be done and what is being done now, we are told that certain instructions have been given, but they are withheld from us, and it is not even intimated that they are withheld for high or public reasons. They are simply withheld, and that is all.

Therefore, sir, I think it was proper for the Senator from Massachusetts, or any other Senator in this body, realizing the distinctions in the various departments of the Government, and knowing the constitutional limitations upon the Executive power, to offer such a resolution, and in my judgment it came none too soon. In saying this I do not propose to express a single opinion or intimate in the least what my sentiments may be in regard to the actual merits of this Hawaiian controversy.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend now to say one word in regard to the condition of affairs in Hawaii a year ago. There is a dispute between the executive officers and the present Administration and the minister of our Government at the time the event occurred. We have been advised in an indirect way or only informally to a limited extent of the nature of the controversy. We know that Mr. Blount was sent for some purpose to acquire information, and that information has come in. It has not been given to the public at large. The great amount of it is yet withheld from the people of the United States, and even from the Congress of the United States.

Whether Mr. Stevens was justified in the course he pursued I am not prepared to say, nor shall I decide that point until I have the fullest and fairest opportunity of examining all that can be said on both sides of the question. But here is the difficulty. The President of the United States tells us, and we are told in the newspapers, that there is a purpose to restore the Government of the Queen, to renew the status quo, and to set aside what is regarded by the Administration as the unlawful act of Mr. Stevens in having the troops of the United States on the island at the time of the revolution. All these are matters of controversy, and I do not intend to enter upon them.

But there is one thing which appears to me very plain, and that is, that the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States have not been treated in the open, fair way in which an Administration or a part of the Government of the United States should treat the Congress of the United States. It is certain that these doubts about the condition of affairs a year ago were in the minds of the President and the officers of the Government when the present Congress met in extra session. It is certain that a gentleman of high standing no doubt, a former member of the other House, had been sent there for the purpose of acquiring information. That information has not been given to the public. It is certain also that the Administration had formed certain definite ideas of their duty.

It has been practically stated that the purpose of the Administration is to restore the status quo which existed before the revolution—put the Queen in power again—but we have not been informed that such is the purpose. The President of the United States and all the officers of the Government may as well understand that the people of the United States do not like this. That is a feature of the Hawaiian controversy that impresses itself upon the mind of the plainest citizen of the United States. Whatever facts exist or whatever suspicions exist in the mind of the President, whatever may be his ideas or his information, it ought to be conveyed not only to Congress, but to the public at large. There is no reason in the world why there should be any secrecy about this matter. All the facts are known or ought to be known to the Administration, and they ought to be communicated.

All I desire to say is, that if it is the purpose of the President of the United States by the use of the military force to restore the Queen to power in Hawaii, it will be, in my judgment, a fatal act of public policy, a great injustice to the people of the United States, and almost an insult to the Congress of the United States. This is the lawmaking power. The President of the United States has no right either to declare war, or to commit an act of war, or to precipitate in any way a controversy of this kind. It seems to me that not only the information called for by the resolution now pending, but all the information that can be given to us should have been communicated to Congress at the last session. Then we might have acted. The question of the appointment of Mr. Willis as minister came before us. There was nothing said in making that appointment as to any particular difficulty in Hawaii, as to any particular danger that might occur, as to any particular act that might be adopted by the executive authorities to restore the status quo; nothing of the kind.

It seems to me it is proper and just for the President of the United States and the executive authorities to give us this information at once, and it should have been at least sent in to us at the last session of Congress, when the public mind would have been prepared for the present condition of affairs.

Now, with these remarks I desire to take up the Hawaiian question and do what is just and fair. The people of the United States have no such interest in this matter that they can not deal fairly and impartially not only to the Queen, whatever may be said of her demerits, but to the people of Hawaii and also the Provisional Government. There is no reason why we should not deal fairly and justly by them. It appears to me if there had been less secrecy about this matter, a more open and fair-handed dealing with the Congress of the United States, there would be less suspicion and trouble. If it should so happen now that in pursuance of the policy of the Executive our troops should be landed in the island and a single life is lost there, it would be caused certainly by an unlawful act.

If the act of Mr. Stevens was unlawful and improper when he landed the marines upon the shores of Hawaii and put them in a position where they might overawe the Queen—if that position is true, then certainly it is equally wrong now for the present minister to land the troops of the United States there to intervene in the existing Government, directly or indirectly to overawe them in the slightest degree, or to take any step whatever to change the condition of affairs now existing. Whatever view may be taken of the action of a year ago, there can be no doubt about the view that will be taken by the people of the United States regarding any act now which involves violence or even the appearance of violence, or threats, or any act whatever done by the executive authorities without the consent of Congress and without the knowledge of Congress.

Therefore, with all the kindly feeling I have for the President, I would say he ought to communicate this information immediately. It ought not to have been delayed. As a Senator of the United States I feel justified in saying, with all due respect to the President of the United States, that this is the information which above all others should have been communicated to the people in his annual message; and I say frankly that when I first read that part of the message it seemed to me unsatisfactory. That is the point on which he should have communicated to us full information. He delayed it too long. All the information he possessed and all the suspicions which had been aroused in his mind as to what had occurred a year ago, ought to have been communicated in the first instance to Congress when it was in session. That is the point of criticism which it seems to me is running through the popular mind now.

The people of the United States would hear with profound regret that the troops of the United States had been compelled for any reason whatever to participate in any controversy that may exist in Hawaii; that the arms of the United States should be compelled to carry death to a single citizen or subject of Hawaii. There is a feeling of anxiety in the public mind evidenced by the public press throughout the country on this subject, and there is a feeling of strong resentment, it appears to me, because the Congress and the people of the United States have not been dealt with with more frankness.

Now, this is all I have to say. Whether the pending resolution passes to-day or to-morrow is a matter of comparative indifference, although I see no reason why the President of the United States should not at once send us the information; and if he has given orders, whatever may be their nature, which shall hereafter lead to trouble and physical violence, the people of the United States will hold him severely to an account for it.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that there is no objection at all to the passage of the pending resolution. I, with him and with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], want all the information in an official form that can possibly be obtained in regard to this unfortunate fiasco in the Central Pacific. The only thing in the way of criticism in regard to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, if I had been present when it was offered, would have been to appeal to him to wait for a very little while to see whether we might not have the presence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. MORGAN]. But even his absence is not an insuperable obstacle to the passage of the resolution. It would be an act of courtesy which is not unusual in this body in a matter of such importance to a standing committee of the rank and grade of the Committee on Foreign Relations to wait a little, to "bide a bit," as the Scotch say, until the chairman of the committee and one or two important members of that committee who are absent shall be present. If they should be absent long, of course that is another question. But I am not disposed to make any point about that.

I think the resolution is a proper resolution. It is one that might well pass, although in view of the annual message of the President of the United States, and what he has said in that message, as was commented on by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], there is not that urgency or exigency which would otherwise, perhaps, obtain for the passage of such a resolution. We have the assurance of the President of the United States that this is a matter which is to be made the subject of a special communication to the Congress of the United States, and with that communication he says it is his purpose to send all the documents which relate to the whole matter of our relations to the Sandwich Islands to Congress for consideration. I think we could afford, if we chose to wait for a day or two, to see whether such a message comes.

The reason given by the President for the short delay he speaks of in sending that message is a very obvious one, it seems to me, because it is a matter of common knowledge that we have no cable communication with the Sandwich Islands. The only means of communication is by the slower process of the steamers that arrive periodically. One is expected to arrive in a few days, bringing information and dispatches from the minister to the Executive, the first there has been an opportunity of receiving, which the President desires to have when he sends his message that he may include them among the important matters of which he wishes to inform the Congress

I think that that probably will be done. I think the President will be quite justified when he receives this resolution, couched as it is in the ordinary conventional language of such resolutions, to wait for a day or two to see whether he can not, when he sends in a copy of the instructions, also send the dispatches of Minister Willis.

But, Mr. President, it does seem to me that there is an amazing tenderness in certain quarters as to what the instructions to Minister Willis may be. There is an amazing solicitude on the part of some of our friends in this body as to whether the President of the United States has on the very first day of the session sent all the correspondence, all the diplomatic notes, all the instructions to ministers for our information.

I do not think there is any precedent (of course I do not speak by the book) for the President of the United States encumbering an annual message, dealing with all the affairs of this great country, with such special matters, especially when he tells us that he expects to make them the subject of a special communication to the Congress. I think that those Senators should bide their time who slept peacefully at night, who had no thorns in their pillows last January when this so-called revolution occurred, when commissioners appeared here with a treaty in their pockets, and were willing to wait the pleasure of the Executive to send to the Senate of the United States the communication that he did send in his own good time. The 15th day of February is the date of the communication sent by the President of the United States detailing the facts and all that led up to this wonderful revolution and the cession of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. Now, it may be that a new color will be put upon some of those facts by subsequent evidence. It may be that they will not contain exactly the color they had when they influenced the President of the United States to attach his signature to that treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to make an inquiry of my colleague upon the Committee on Foreign Relations. Was not the communication from Mr. Blount on which the charge against Mr. Stevens is founded made to the executive authorities some two or three months ago? When did Mr. Blount return?

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the last session closed.

Mr. HAWLEY. In July.

Mr. SHERMAN. He returned some time in July, I think. Mr. Willis was appointed soon afterwards. The information upon which all the action is based is Mr. Blount's statement, which was made to the President in July. It has always appeared to me strange that that report was not sent to Congress.

Mr. GRAY. I am not discussing the merits of this situation, for the very reason that no communications have been sent to Congress and we have no official information as to what the attitude of the Executive is towards those islands. I am very anxious that we shall have that information, and for that reason I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, not because I think it will hurry so much the communication that will come in due course from the Executive.

I merely alluded to this because I thought there was an asperity in the tone of those who are advocating the passage of the resolution which demanded some attention. I do not see that the Executive in this case (certainly there is no evidence to the effect) has transcended his powers or has in any way violated the usages which obtain in the diplomatic intercourse of the United States with foreign countries. On the contrary, he has told us that he expects to lay before the Congress within a few days every bit of information he has, and expecting that, and desiring it, I am quite content to abide until that communication comes before forming my own judgment or attempting to discuss the merits of the situation.

I do not sympathize with the exceeding haste and zeal of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who is so anxious to throw this resolution at the President of the United States, that he even wants to take out of it the ordinary conventional language which accompanies all such resolutions. I do not suppose the Senator from New York was aware that all resolutions calling upon the President for information are framed in precisely this manner. It is the ordinary conventional language which obtains in all such resolutions.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I think I so expressly stated. The information which the Senator furnishes to me is not needed, because I stated it myself. I stated that while I was glad the usual form had been observed in this particular, it is simply unnecessary so far as giving the President a right to withhold the information. I can see no reason why the information should be withheld for any public consideration.

Mr. GRAY. I had hoped that it was ignorance on the part of the Senator from New York. It appears that it was not.

Mr. HILL. The ignorance seems to be on the part of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I had hoped it was ignorance on the part of the Senator from New York when he suggested that the clause was unnecessary. It now appears that, for the first time in the history of intercourse between this branch and the Executive, we are to have this courteous language, which has been founded upon usage and upon good reason, taken out of a resolution. The Senator may see good reason for it, but I do not think any other Senator within the sound of my voice will see it.

Now, if the Senator from Massachusetts can not agree with me, as I hoped he might, that we should wait for a day or two merely, for the presence of our chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and one other important member of the majority of that committee on this side—if he does not think that that should be done, I shall vote with him for the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FRYE obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Will the honorable Senator from Maine allow me to say one word in reply to the personal appeal to me?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to say that no man has a higher regard than I have for the Senator from Alabama who is now absent. I suppose the length of his absence, from the information I get, can not be predicted as yet; and I am very sure that he would be delighted to find this information here on his table awaiting him when he gets back.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I do not know how long the presence of the Senator from Alabama here may be deferred. I merely wanted to wait for a day or two. If it should prove that he is not to be here then, of course there would be no excuse for further delay. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will, in view of that fact, withdraw the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FRYE. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. VILAS. I have no objection at all to withdrawing the motion, and in view of the statement of the Senator from Delaware I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The motion is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, under those circumstances and owing to the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the further fact that this subject has undoubtedly been referred to that committee in that portion of the President's message relating to Hawaii, I shall not enter upon any discussion of the merits of this case at the present time, hoping and expecting by and by, when the committee have considered the facts, to take part in a debate upon the Hawaiian question.

I will simply say at this moment, and content myself with the statement, that the greater part of the day I have been absent on a conference committee. I was informed on my return to the Chamber that some Senators, whom I do not know, had spoken with a great deal of bitterness about Minister Stevens, who was at Hawaii at the time of the revolution, and that they had attempted to throw discredit upon him. I merely desire to state that my colleague and I have known Mr. Stevens intimately since we were boys. He has been a prominent figure in Maine for the last thirty years. He is a man of the very highest character, and is entirely above reproach. No one familiar with him would question any statement of fact he made as coming within his own observation, nor would dream of doing so.

When this matter is further under discussion both my colleague and myself will with great pleasure defend Mr. Stevens against any attacks which may be made upon him from any quarter whatsoever.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to say a very few words upon this subject. It seems to me that we have gone very far out of the way to find some ground of objection to the President of the United States in respect to this matter of Hawaii. It seems to be assumed here that the President has no constitutional duty imperative upon him to perform in this respect. What is the provision of the Constitution? The President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

What are the laws? The Constitution declares that the laws passed under the authority of the Constitution and the treaties made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land.

We have a treaty guaranteeing the existence of the established Government of Hawaii. By what authority has that treaty been abolished that it is not imperative upon the President of the United States? By what authority is that treaty not the supreme law of the land, whose stipulations no minister and no President and no authority, except that of Congress, can destroy?

What is the President to do under his oath when there is a treaty guaranteeing the existence of the dethroned Government of Hawaii? Is there any doubt upon the subject that the tripartite treaty of 1889, the Berlin treaty, so requires? Then, if there is to be a change, it must be by authority of the Constitution. That treaty is obligatory upon the President of the United States until Congress shall change its provisions; yet we have gone out of the way to assail the President of the United States when an imperative obligation of law imposed by the Constitution rests upon him to respect and execute the provisions of this tripartite treaty of Berlin.

Mr. President, for one I am not opposed to extending protection in proper circumstances over governments distant from our own country whenever our commercial and financial interests shall require it. But that is not the question here. The question is, what was the obligation upon the President of the United States? Could a former Administration abolish that treaty and its obligations? Could a minister of the United States in any respect impair the obligation which that treaty, still existing, imposes upon the Executive of the United States?

I merely desired to say these few words, and will add that although this resolution may be a proper one, and that information may properly be asked for by Congress, and no doubt would be furnished by the President without any unnecessary delay, yet, in the existing status of things there is but one obligation upon the President; that is, to see that the laws as they exist and the treaties made are executed and carried into effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 7, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 6, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday a document was laid before the House by the Chair relating to appropriations designated as "Propagation of food-fishes, 1893," which was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The Committee on Appropriations called for the statement in question, and it occurs to me that it should be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The reference will be corrected, in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Texas, and the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ANNUAL REPORT, BOARD OF ORDNANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the annual report of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for the year ending October 3, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RAFT TOWING, GREAT LAKES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers submitting a copy of the report of the board of officers relating to raft towing on the Great Lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF CRAWFISH AND MILL CREEKS, OHIO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Chief of Engineers, transmitting preliminary examination and survey of Crawfish and Mill Creeks, Ohio, for location for ice harbor in the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

EMPLOYÉS, ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, reporting as to the standard of efficiency of employés in his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COL. ANSON MILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this joint resolution. It has been considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the committee have directed it to be reported unanimously with favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Anson Mills, colonel Third Regiment United States Cavalry, having been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate as a commissioner of the United States under the convention between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, concluded and signed by the contracting parties at the city of Washington, March 1, 1889, is hereby permitted to accept and exercise the functions of said office of commissioner: Provided, Said officer shall continue to receive his emoluments in pay and allowances as colonel in the Army while holding said office of commissioner the same as he would receive were he performing such duty under military orders, and no other additional pay or emoluments for his services as such commissioner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DOCKERY. I would be glad if the gentleman would make a statement in reference to this matter.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Under the convention between the Governments of the United States and Mexico, to establish the boundary line between these two countries along the disputed territory on the Rio Grande, it was provided that a commission of each government should be selected for this purpose. Col. Anson Mills, an engineer in the employ of the Government, has served for a number of years in that region and is thoroughly familiar with the river and the changes which have occurred in it from time to time. He was selected because of his familiarity with the region in which this commission is to serve.

At present there is a strip of land on which the Mexicans occasionally arrest our citizens and carry them over into Mexico, and on which our officers also arrest Mexicans and bring them into Texas. It is desired to have the question settled as speedily as possible. Col. Mills, as the resolution provides, shall receive only the compensation which he would receive as an officer of the Army if detailed for this work. It provides, therefore, a saving to the Government by permitting him to exercise the functions of this office.

The necessity for this action arises because of the question as to the peculiar language used in the articles of convention. It says that the commissioners must be selected according to the constitutional provisions of the representative governments and there is some question as to Col. Mills filling both offices in the absence of this authority.

Mr. COOMBS. This is what the President referred to in his message?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (H. Res. 86) with Senate amendments, to pay session and other employés and per diem employés, and that they may be retained during the coming recess; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the resolutions of the Senate with reference to the death of Hon. William Lilly, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania;

Also the resolution of the Senate with reference to the death of Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania; which were severally laid upon the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JOSEPH for three weeks on account of important business.

SUSPENSION OF CERTAIN PENSIONS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it was publicly stated by the Pension Office, and so published, that the following-named persons who had prior to the 4th day of July, A. D. 1893, been borne upon the pension rolls of the United States as pensioners, to wit:

* * * * * * *

And whereas it appears by official publication and information believed to be true that these pensioners were between said July 4, 1893, and the 1st pay of October, 1893, dropped from the pension rolls or suspended and deprived of their pensions;

And whereas between the 1st day of October, A. D. 1893, and the 4th day of November, A. D. 1893, the following-named persons, part of said list, and numbering upwards of 1,300 in all, were reinstated upon the pension rolls of the Pension Office; and

* * * * * * *

Whereas all of said list were residents of the State of Ohio, and were borne on the rolls of the pension pay office at Columbus, O.; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to inform the House of Representatives why and upon what ground the said 1,900 names stricken from the rolls aforesaid were so stricken off, and upon what evidence, information, or knowledge the Pension Office acted in striking from the rolls the aforesaid 1,900 names; and, furthermore,

Resolved, That the honorable Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House of Representatives upon what requests, evidence, knowledge or information the said 1,300 names, portions of said 1,900 names, were restored to the pension rolls; and especially to furnish the House of Representatives with any requests, applications, or letters which may have been received by the Pension Office requesting such reinstatement, and also such correspondence as passed from the Pension Office to said applicants in regard to such applications and reinstatements.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a memorial a few days ago, looking to an investigation somewhat in this direction, and had it referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I think this resolution ought to go to the same committee, because there may be some matters which that committee should consider.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. Res. 77) conferring diplomas upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think this is the first enrollment under the new rule reported by the joint commission.

The SPEAKER. It is the first, and it is very handsomely enrolled.

CALL OF COMMITTEES FOR REPORTS.

The committees were then called for reports, but no reports of a public character were presented.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past 12 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The Committee on Indian Affairs presented no business.

The call of committees was resumed.

UNITED STATES COURTS, MISSISSIPPI.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 4245) to amend an act pertaining to the United States courts in the State of Mississippi.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Mississippi City," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"That the counties of Hancock, Harrison, Jackson, Marion, Pearl River, Perry, Greene, Jones, Wayne, Clarke, Jasper, and Covington, being a part of the southern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, shall be known as and constitute the southern division of said southern district; and circuit and district courts for the transaction of business pertaining to persons and property in said southern division shall be held at Mississippi City, Miss., on the third Mondays of February and August in each year."

SEC. 2. That all the provisions of the act to which this is amendatory shall apply to the added counties, Jones, Wayne, Clarke, Jasper, Pearl River, and Covington, in the same manner as to the original counties named in said act; and all cases, civil and criminal, arising in said added counties and now pending in the courts at Jackson, Miss., shall not be affected by this enactment, but shall be finally determined in said courts, unless removed to the courts at Mississippi City by consent of parties, in which case the courts at Mississippi City shall have jurisdiction to try and determine them.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE].

The SPEAKER. Are there any amendments?

Mr. STOCKDALE. There are no amendments. I ask that the bill be put upon its third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOCKDALE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUPREME COURT, OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 288) to provide for three additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were read at length.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, owing to some errors in the bill that has been read, we submit the following substitute which is authorized by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] offers a substitute. The Chair will state that amendments to the original bill should be voted upon before the substitute. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma shall consist of a chief justice and four associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; but three judges must concur to render an opinion.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the President to appoint two additional associate justices of said supreme court, who shall hold their office for the term of four years, or until their successors are appointed and qualified, and who shall receive the same compensation as now provided for the justices of the supreme court of Oklahoma Territory.

SEC. 3. That the said Territory shall be divided into five judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each county, as now provided by law. The supreme court of said Territory shall define said judicial districts, and shall fix the times and places at each county seat in each district where the district court shall be held, and designate the judge who shall preside therein. Each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned. The supreme court of said Territory, or the chief justice thereof, may designate any judge to try a particular case or cases in any district when the judge of said district has been of counsel, or is of kin to either party to the action, or interested, or is biased or prejudiced in the cause, or if for any other reason said judge is unable to hold court.

SEC. 4. That the district court in each of said districts shall have the same jurisdiction that district courts of said Territory now possess.

SEC. 5. That no justice of the supreme court of said Territory shall sit as a member of said court in the trial of any case decided by him in the district court, or wherein he has any interest.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the original bill asked for three additional justices for the Territory of Oklahoma. That bill was referred to a subcommittee, who investigated the necessity for extra judges, and after an investigation they were satisfied that there should be two additional judges provided for. Hence they have recommended the relief provided for in the substitute which is submitted. One hundred and fifty thousand people went into that Territory in the month of September. Everything is in confusion, and the way is to be blazed by the judiciary. There is no question that the three judges provided for the Territory when it was originally organized can not do the judicial work necessarily arising in that new and growing community. Therefore there is no difference of opinion among the members of the committee as to the necessity for the two additional judges provided for in the substitute that has been submitted.

The SPEAKER. Certain amendments to the bill have been reported from the committee. If it is the desire of the committee, by unanimous consent the substitute might be considered instead.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments reported by the committee may be withdrawn and the substitute voted upon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendments reported by the committee will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended to conform to the body of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the concurrent resolution, Miscellaneous Document No. 39.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there are constantly before Congress numerous bills dealing with the question of rank and pay in the Navy, and other matters concerning the personnel of the same; and

Whereas the present laws relating to this subject are in many instances imperfect, inconsistent, unjust, and the result of piecemeal legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed respectively by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to fully investigate and consider the entire subject of the rank, pay, and all other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy; to have power to send for persons and papers, sit during the recess, if any, and during the sitting of both Houses, and to report at any time after it convenes as may be convenient what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises; any bill so reported by them shall simplify, codify, and revise existing laws relating to the personnel of the Navy so far as may be found possible. And said joint committee is hereby authorized to employ a clerk at $6 per day and a messenger at $3 per day while employed, and any expenses incurred by said commission in performing the duties herein required shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I shall insist that it shall be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to inquire if this is a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution comes up for consideration in the second morning hour, as it is called.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will now report.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if this bill has ever been upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is on the Union Calendar, and was reported on the 19th of October last.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to inquire if this resolution has not been once considered in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question of fact. The Chair will endeavor to ascertain the fact. (After a pause.) The Chair is advised that this resolution has not been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KILGORE. My information was that it was considered in the second morning hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Calendar does not show that this bill has ever been considered in Committee of the Whole, although the impression seems to be general about the desk that some consideration, or attempt at consideration, has been given heretofore. The gentleman from Louisiana perhaps will state the fact.

Mr. MEYER. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs I asked for unanimous consent to consider that resolution some weeks ago, and objection was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE]. The resolution was then withdrawn, but no other action was had.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution has not been considered in the committee. The Clerk will now report the resolution.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I never withdrew my objection to that measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana states that the request was for unanimous consent when the gentleman objected. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, now I have——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. I have nothing to say, Mr. Chairman, against the constitution of the commission, but I shall insist that the latter clause of the resolution be stricken out. I mean that portion which refers to the employment of a clerk and messenger, for the reason that the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House already has two clerks, and I do not know how many clerks in the Senate the same committee has. If the gentleman in charge of the resolution will consent to strike out the portion indicated I have no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. SAYERS. I move to strike out the last clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "possible" strike out the following language:
"And said joint commission is hereby authorized to employ a clerk at $6 per day and a messenger at $3 per day while employed, and any expenses incurred by said commission in performing the duties herein required shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses."

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs, in recommending the passage of this resolution, believed that the expenses and the employment of a messenger and an additional clerk necessary; but, yielding to the judgment of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and to the views of other members of the House, we have concluded to accept that amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I have no objection, then, to the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I am apprehensive that this is a snare, not to say a delusion. [Laughter.] This resolution has to go to the Senate, for it is a concurrent resolution, and they will stick that proposition back on it, when it will become a privileged question in this House. I am opposed to the adoption of any portion of it.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt, should the Senate decline to adopt this resolution as now submitted and insert such an amendment, that the conferees on the part of the House will in good faith represent the House and refuse to agree to any proposition to restore the clause which is to be stricken out.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, if that is the arrangement [laughter], if these gentlemen will so put themselves on record as to estop themselves, I will be willing that the resolution should pass, otherwise I should not be.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, if this resolution shall pass and I should have the honor of being a member of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this subject, I would in good faith try to carry out the understanding had with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to the matter.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Louisiana will yield to me for a moment, I simply wish to ask him a question with a view of throwing some light on the joint resolution.

Mr. MEYER. Certainly; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would be pleased to have the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] or the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] state what necessity there is for the adoption of this joint resolution.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would suggest that the gentleman read the report of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have looked at the report of the Secretary of the Navy; but this is a joint resolution introduced in the House of Representatives, proposed to be passed here and sent to the Senate for adoption, and I would like to know the object and the necessity of it. I know that the two distinguished gentlemen [Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. MEYER] never offer or advocate resolutions without having good reasons, and I want to give them an opportunity in this case to state their reasons to the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Secretary of the Navy, after detailing the reasons for recommending this action, says:

I am engaged in the preparation of a plan for the reorganization of the line of the Navy which I think will meet the requirements of the service, and I shall have the honor to present it to the Committee on Naval Affairs and also to the joint committee to investigate and consider the subject of the rank, pay, and other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy proposed in the concurrent resolution introduced by the Hon. Mr. MEYER, in case said concurrent resolution proposed becomes a law.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. And, in addition to that, I would refer the gentleman from Kentucky to the very able report on this subject by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Could not the communication which the Secretary of the Navy proposes to make be sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs instead of to a select committee?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Senate is concerned in this matter as well as the House.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I admit that.

Mr. CUMMINGS. This joint resolution was drawn up in the last Congress by the present Secretary of the Navy, who was then chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, but he was unable to bring it up for consideration before the adjournment.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. My friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and other gentlemen with whom I have served all know that I am a friend of the Navy. I have advocated an increase of the Navy, but we have reached a point now where, with a depleted Treasury, we ought to be very cautious about making appropriations that are not absolutely necessary.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will say to the gentleman that this joint resolution has nothing to do with an increase of the Navy. The select committee may even succeed in cutting down the expenses through the proposed investigation. At all events, there is no intention to increase those expenses. Let me say further to the gentleman that, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] being accepted, this inquiry will not cost the country one cent, and therefore I see no reason why the joint resolution should not be adopted.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state the substance of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The joint resolution provided for a clerk at $6 a day and a messenger at $3 a day, and the amendment of the gentleman from Texas cuts that out.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I, too, am friendly to the Navy. I am friendly to it because it has more guns and bigger guns than I have. [Laughter.] But I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not the experience of Congress that these committees or commissions for the investigation of the rank and pay of officials under this Government generally recommend an enlargement of the rank and an increase of the pay? That has been their history, according to my observation. If there is going to be a new departure in that respect this will be a unique committee. I understand the gentleman from New York to say that it does not propose to enlarge the rank or increase the pay.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if I am a member of the committee, so far as my personal influence is concerned it will not be used in favor of increasing the expense of the Navy Department.

Mr. MEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I believe this joint resolution as amended ought to pass. From time immemorial there has been disagreement between officers of the staff and the officers of the line of the Navy, and that disagreement has always been brought into the Committee on Naval Affairs. The object of this joint resolution is to provide for settling those differences between the line and the staff permanently.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me add that there are to-day about fifty bills in the Committee on Naval Affairs, private bills, having reference to these very differences between the line and the staff, and if this joint committee can be appointed these personal matters and grievances can be settled in the Navy Department instead of being brought before the Committee on Naval Affairs year after year.

The amendment offered by Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York why the Committee on Naval Affairs can not take charge of this matter and deal with it as well as a special committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Because we desire to act in concert with the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COX. Then this is to be a joint committee?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEYER. I move that the committee rise and report the resolution to the House with the recommendation that it be passed with the amendment.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 32, noes 37.

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 41 voting in favor thereof; and Mr. KILGORE and Mr. MEYER were appointed.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 9.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair, under the rule, will cause the roll to be called.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following-named members answered:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration a concurrent resolution of the House providing for a joint committee to investigate the personnel of the Navy, the Committee of the Whole had found itself without a quorum; whereupon the Chairman directed the roll to be called, and now reported to the House the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The roll call showing the presence of a quorum, the committee under the rule would resume its session, but the morning hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SALARIES OF DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE, ETC.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to the consideration of Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893.

The amendments were read, as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 5, page 1, insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to read, "$50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the salaries," etc.

In line 7, page 1, strike out the words "it may be found," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Secretary of the Treasury may determine to be:" so as to read, "as many additional deputy collectors of internal revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine to be necessary," etc.

Mr. SAYERS. I move concurrence in these amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES SHIELDS.

The SPEAKER. It now lacks but a few minutes of half past 1 o'clock, for which time there has been assigned a special order, which will be at once proceeded with if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The special order was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 6th day of December, at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon be designated and set apart for the consideration of the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Illinois, for the statue of Gen. James Shields, whose name is so honorably identified with the history of the State and of the United States.

Resolved, That this statue is accepted in the name of the United States, and is assigned a place in the old hall of the House of Representatives, already set apart by act of Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed a resolution similar to that just read, and it will be communicated to the House in a few minutes. I shall ask that that resolution be adopted in lieu of the one now pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that in the meantime the gentleman proceed with his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, on the 15th of June, 1893, the Legislature of Illinois passed an act creating a commission to be appointed by the governor, which was authorized to purchase a heroic bronze statue of Gen. James Shields, and a bronze or granite pedestal therefor, properly inscribed and ornamented, and to transport the same to the Statuary Hall, in the Capitol at Washington, as one of the statues which the State of Illinois is authorized by law of Congress to place therein. The commission has performed the duty imposed upon it, and the governor of the State has informed Congress of the fact, in the communication which was laid before the House on yesterday. In pursuance of the custom which has been observed in other cases of this kind, I have submitted the concurrent resolution, which has just been read, and move its adoption.

There must have been special reasons for the action of the State of Illinois in paying this tribute to the memory of James Shields. The State which gave to the service of our country such illustrious statesmen and heroes as Lincoln, Douglas, Grant, and Shields was not wanting in citizens upon whom could be justly conferred the honor of erecting statues to their memory in Statuary Hall.

A brief reference to the life, character, and services of Gen. Shields will prove conclusively that in honoring his memory by placing his statue in Statuary Hall at the capital of his adopted country the State of Illinois has made no mistake.

James Shields was born in Dungannon, County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1810. In 1827, at the age of 17, he came to the United States. In 1832 he settled in the town of Kaskaskia, in the State of Illinois, and began the practice of law. He took great interest in politics, and in 1836, before he was naturalized, he was elected to the Legislature of Illinois. In 1839 Governor Carlin appointed him auditor of the State. Some question having arisen as to his citizenship, having come to this country when a minor, in order to remove all doubt on the subject he took out final naturalization papers in October, 1840. Afterwards this fact became very important to him, as will be seen later on in his eventful career.

In 1843 he was elected by the Legislature of the State a justice of the supreme court of the State of Illinois. At that time the constitution of the State provided for the election of the judges of the supreme court by a joint convention of the two houses of the Legislature. In 1845 President Polk appointed him Commissioner of the General Land Office. While discharging the duties of this office the war with Mexico began. This war furnished an opportunity for the display of his most remarkable talents. At the very beginning of the war he was made a brigadier-general, his commission bearing date of July 1, 1846. He was assigned to the command of the Illinois regiments. He served under Gens. Taylor, Wool, and Scott in the campaigns in different parts of Mexico, which they respectively carried on.

At the battle of Cerro Gordo, which occurred on the 18th of April, 1847, he bore a conspicuous part. Gen. Scott with a force of 8,500 men totally defeated the Mexican army of 12,000 men, under command of Gen. Santa Anna. The Mexicans lost over 1,000 in killed and wounded, and 3,000 prisoners. Gen. Shields was in the thickest of the fight. He received a gunshot wound which was believed at the time to be mortal, the ball having passed through his body, in the region of his lungs. His death was announced in American journals; but to the surprise of his surgeons and to the delight of his friends, he recovered, and was afterwards brevetted a major-general for gallant services. He did not avail himself, however, of his severe and almost mortal wound to return to his home. As soon as he could mount his horse he joined his command. Under Gen. Scott he took part in the battles in the valley of Mexico, commanding a brigade composed of marines, and New York and South Carolina volunteers. He was again severely wounded at Chapultepec.

Such was his soldiery conduct during that campaign, and especially at Churubusco and Chapultepec, that the State of South Carolina voted him a beautiful and costly sword, inscribed with the names of those battles, and the following sentiment:

From the State of South Carolina to Gen. Shields, in testimony of her admiration of his gallantry in the Mexican war, and a tribute of gratitude for his parental attention to the Palmetto Regiment.

He was mustered out in July, 1848, and soon after, having returned to the State of Illinois, he was tendered by the President of the United States the appointment of governor of the Territory of Oregon. This office he declined. There was a contest at this time in the State of Illinois for the seat in the United States Senate, then occupied by Sidney Breese. His contestants for the honor were Senator Breese and Gen. John A. McClernand. Senator Breese desired to succeed himself, and had the prestige of a successful Senatorial career. Gen. McClernand was then a popular young politician residing in southern Illinois, and had borne an honorable part in the Mexican war; but the military fame of Gen. Shields carried him triumphantly through the Democratic caucus, and he was elected Senator for the term beginning March 4, 1849. He presented his credentials, and, having a prima facie case, was sworn in and took the seat, notwithstanding the fact that a protest against his admission as a Senator was presented to the Senate on the ground that at the time of the election he had not been a citizen of the United States for nine years, as required by the third paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

After thorough investigation, the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported a resolution to the effect that Gen. Shields was not eligible at the commencement of the term for which he was elected and that his election was void. This resolution was adopted, and the seat was declared vacant. Before its adoption, however, he stated that he would appeal to the State of Illinois for a vindication, and asserted that if that State did not respond to his appeal that it was his intention, though he had endeavored to prove his fidelity to his country, never to offer himself again for office in the United States.

The question of his eligibility was thoroughly discussed, as was also the question as to whether the governor of the State had the right to appoint his successor. Mr. Douglas, then a Senator from the State of Illinois, held that the governor had the power to make the appointment; but Governor French took the opposite view, disclaiming any such power. Believing that he had no power to make an appointment under the circumstances, he called the Legislature together in extraordinary session October 22, 1849, for the purpose of electing a United States Senator; but included in his call some minor subjects of legislation.

At the time the called session assembled Gen. Shields had been a citizen of the United States for nine years, and the governor undoubtedly convened the Legislature at this time so that Gen. Shields would be rendered eligible if the Legislature should see fit to reëlect him. The same Legislature having been reconvened which had elected Gen. Shields, it was not unreasonable to assume that he would be renominated without a contest; but such was not the case. The prize was too glittering to be conceded to Shields without a contest. Twenty-one ballots were had in the Democratic caucus before a nomination was made. On the first ballot Shields received 28, Breese 21, and McClernand 18 votes; and, on the last, Breese received 20, McClernand 12, and Shields 37. Having a majority of all the votes cast, he was again made the nominee of the Democratic party, and was elected after a further contest continuing until the seventh ballot in joint convention of the two houses. He served to the end of his term, March 4, 1855. At the expiration of his term he removed to Minnesota, and when that State was admitted into the Union he was elected United States Senator, and drew the short term, taking his seat on the 12th of May, 1858, and served until March 3, 1859.

The discovery of gold in California had drawn to that State many of the brightest intellects of this country. Gen. Shields cast his lot for a time with the people of that State. In 1861 he drifted into Mexico and was engaged as superintendent of a mine. The war of the rebellion having broken out, the military spirit was rekindled in his veins, and he hastened to Washington and tendered his services to the President. He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers on the 9th of August, 1861, and was assigned to the command of Gen. Frederick W. Lander's brigade after the latter's death.

On the 23d of March, 1862, at the head of a division of Gen. Banks's army in the Shenandoah Valley, he opened the second campaign with victory at Winchester, having defeated Stonewall Jackson in one of the hardest-fought battles of the civil war, receiving in the desperate struggle serious wounds in the arms, shoulders, and side. He was congratulated by Gens. McClellan and Banks and Secretary Edwin M. Stanton "for the energy, activity, and bravery displayed on this occasion," and was further honored by Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, by an order directing that the flags of the Pennsylvania regiments be inscribed "Winchester, March 23, 1862."

On June 9th, however, at Port Republic, he was defeated by Stonewall Jackson in one of the most remarkable assaults of that intrepid leader. He resigned his commission in the Army on the 28th of March, 1863. He returned to California, but soon removed to the State of Missouri, where he took up his residence and resumed the practice of the law. He served as a railroad commissioner, and was a member of the Legislature of that State from 1874 to 1879. He was elected a Senator from that State to fill out the unexpired term in the Forty-fourth Congress of Louis V. Bogy, deceased, and served but a few months in this capacity.

Gen. Shields was a military genius. On the 10th of January, 1862, at the very commencement of the civil war, he addressed a letter to Maj. Gen. McClellan, commander-in-chief of the Army, in which he outlined at length the military operations which he deemed necessary for the suppression of the rebellion. This communication was evidently placed in the hands of President Lincoln, for his Secretary of State, William H. Seward, in an official communication under date of January 14, 1862, communicated it to the Secretary of War, inviting his attention thereto. This letter of Gen. Shields is published in the "Record of the War of the Rebellion," series I, volume 5, pages 701, 702, and 703.

It is one of the most important papers relating to the conduct of the war, and stamps its author as one of the ablest generals which the war produced. In brief, his recommendations were to the effect that Richmond and Memphis were to be the objective points of the campaign, and that all efforts should be directed toward their capture and occupation by the Union forces. He pointed out minutely the plan of a campaign which should be carried on against Richmond and urged the importance of exercising "such caution and steadiness as to preclude the possibility of any casualty, however insignificant, so that the whole army should arrive before that place in heart and spirit." He suggested that whether the occupation ought to be conducted by slow and certain operations or by rapid and irresistible assaults, must be determined on the ground and at the time, in view of all the circumstances.

There is no doubt but this plan was substantially the one which Gen. McClellan favored. In Gen. Shields' letter he states that after consultation with McClellan he agreed fully with him in reference to the conduct of the war. There is no doubt that President Lincoln and Gen. McClellan had great confidence in the military wisdom and skill of Gen. Shields, and that they esteemed his advice very highly.

Gen. Shields enjoys the distinction of having represented three great States in the Senate of the United States, and having achieved honor as a military chieftain in two great wars. Besides this, he held many offices of honor in the several States of which he was Senator, notably the position of justice of the supreme court of the State of Illinois, to which he was elected by the Legislature of the State when but 33 years of age.

In personal appearance he was dignified and commanding; socially he was genial, devoted to his friends, and affectionate to his family. He had the rare faculty of closely attaching to him all who enjoyed his friendship. He was thoroughly honest, quick to resent an injury, and fearless in the vindication of the right. His patriotism was unbounded by sectional lines, and his devotion to his adopted country was as great as ever was exhibited by one to the manor born. He loved liberty and believed in the equality of all men before the law. The State of Illinois has worthily bestowed the great honor upon his memory by causing a heroic statue in bronze to be erected and placed in Statuary Hall. There it will remain as long as time will endure to testify to the appreciation in which he was held by the State which he so ably served, and to commemorate his patriotism, self-sacrifice, and devotion to the welfare of his adopted country. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Gen. James Shields was born in Ireland in the year 1810; died at Ottawa, Iowa, in the year 1879.

He emigrated to the United States in the year 1826, read law, and commenced the practice of his profession at Kaskaskia, Ill., in the year 1832. He was elected to the Illinois Legislature in the year 1839, and was a contemporary of Douglas, Lincoln, Hardin, David Davis, Stephen T. Logan, Judge Breese, Lyman Trumbull, and Gen. E. D. Baker. He was auditor of the State in 1839, was subsequently judge of the Illinois supreme court, and in 1845 was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office.

In the war with Mexico he was appointed a brigadier-general. He was shot through the right lung at the battle of Cerro Gordo, and was wounded at Chapultepec. After the close of that war he was appointed governor of the Territory of Oregon, and later was chosen United States Senator from the State of Illinois, his service expiring in 1855. He next became a citizen of the State of Minnesota and was chosen United States Senator from that State in 1858. In 1861 he was commissioned a brigadier-general in the Union Army, and served with the Army of the Potomac with distinguished honor. At Kenistown and Port Republic he defeated Stonewall Jackson. He resigned his commission in 1863, settled in Wisconsin, and then removed to Carrollton, Mo., where he practiced law. He then served as railroad commissioner in 1874, next in the Missouri Legislature, and in January, 1879, was chosen United States Senator from the State of Missouri. He died in June of that year.

Peterson, in his Military Heroes, War of 1812 and the War with Mexico, says:

> Gen. Shields's life presented no event worth recording until his appointment as a brigadier-general on the commencement of the Mexican war.

The Mexican war gave to the United States a great empire, rich in soil and minerals. The eye of the seer can not cover or the tongue of the prophet can not foretell the importance of that acquisition to us and to those who follow after. In the war to preserve the Union, the fate of the nation—aye more, of a civilization—was at stake. In the arbitrament of battle Gen. Shields was a conspicuous figure in both contests. There were many greater statesmen, many greater generals; but in demeanor and personal courage, supplemented by that enthusiasm and leadership in action that command the admiration and touch the hearts of men, perhaps none excelled him. His place in his country's annals is fixed by his military service.

The respect and love of the people of Illinois after the Mexican war dictated his choice as United States Senator from that State over the late Sidney Breese—one of the builders of that Commonwealth, a great jurist and statesman, the impress of whose genius and ability is written on every page of that State's history for over sixty years. The greatest tribute that Illinois can pay to the memory of Gen. Shields is paid by placing his statue in the Nation's Capitol, side by side with the statues of Garfield, Allen of Ohio, and Ethan Allen, Winthrop, Trumbull, Samuel Adams, Muhlenberg, King, Kearney, and others. These statues constitute a part of the history of the country in stone and bronze. Casting our eyes along and over the whole history of the country, Gen. Shields, in the contests of his day and generation, is fairly typical of one of the forces that molded the Republic in its formative period, and that preserved our civilization in the crucial tests of battle. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Illinois [Gen. HENDERSON] had expected to address the House on this occasion, but he is unable, because of illness, to be present. He has requested me to ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to print some remarks in the RECORD upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the request of the gentleman from Illinois will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to delineate either the history or the character of the great man whose memory we commemorate to-day, but shall simply speak of him as related to the great State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor.

After the close of the late war Gen. Shields came to the State of Missouri, bought a farm near the town of Carrollton, in Carroll County, and became a citizen of that Commonwealth. A few years later, in 1868, he was the candidate of the Democratic party for a seat in this House. That was during the reconstruction period, during which time one-half of the citizens of that district and State were disfranchised. Gen. Shields took up the cause of the people and advocated their liberty. Having been a soldier of distinction both in the Mexican war and in the late civil war, his character as a loyal citizen and a statesman lent charm and influence to that canvass.

To show the magnanimity of the character of this great soldier, it is related of him that on one occasion one of his admirers in introducing him to the people introduced him as the only man who had ever conquered Stonewall Jackson. In reply to that Gen. Shields modestly stated that although he had come nearer, perhaps, than any other soldier to whipping Stonewall Jackson, yet the truth of history impelled him to say that Stonewall Jackson was never conquered.

He was elected, Mr. Speaker, by the vote of the people of that district, but in one of the counties of the district, the county of Jackson, the whole poll was thrown out, and thus his competitor, Gen. Van Horn, was given the certificate of election.

Afterwards the people of Carroll County, availing themselves of his great ability, elected him to the Legislature of the State and he served one term in the general assembly of Missouri. In 1879 a vacancy in the United States Senate from that State having occurred on account of the death of Lewis V. Bogy, Col. Armstrong of Missouri had been appointed to fill the vacancy, but the Legislature of the State met in the mean time and before the vacancy expired elected Gen. Shields to the United States Senate. He was elected at the same time that our distinguished Senator VEST was first elected, Mr. VEST being elected to the long term of six years and Gen. Shields to fill out the unexpired term of Mr. Bogy. He took his seat in the United States Senate and served from January, 1879, until March of that year, and went to his home. He died at Autumwa, Iowa, in June, 1879, and was buried in the county of Carroll, near Carrollton, his old home.

All, Mr. Speaker, of mortality that remains of this great man sleeps in the bosom of my State. Mr. Speaker, as the Father of Waters rising in the great north State of Minnesota and flowing with majestic power through the whole breadth of this great nation on and on to the sea, laving the borders of Missouri and Illinois, it is but meet and proper that the people of these three great States that honored Gen. Shields with a seat in the councils of the nation may ask to be permitted to take a particular part in the effort of the whole people to commemorate the memory and the character of this great man. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the kindly insistence of my colleagues has assigned to me the pleasing task of speaking to the pending resolution, the purport of which is to accept from the State of Illinois, in behalf of the United States, a statue of one of her illustrious citizens.

The law devolved upon the Legislature of that State the duty of the selection of the man who was thus to be commemorated, and it was no easy task which thus fell to the General Assembly at Springfield.

Mr. Speaker, it was not an easy task to select the foremost man from among the men who for more than two hundred years have been part of the great procession of humanity which has swept across the borders of the State of Illinois, which State, by its geographical location, its extent, and the incidents of its formation, is peculiarly the central Commonwealth of the great American Republic.

Before Virginia had ceded to the Federal Union the territory from which Illinois was framed, the State had been the home of men of distinction and renown. Our counties, our cities, and our rivers bear record of the memory of our people for those who were working at the very foundations of the State in its youth.

There were dwelling for a time the devout Joliet, the chivalrous La Salle, the earnest Marquette; and after and with them, all that countless tide of men, undistinguished save perchance in the little circle of their own neighborhoods, who in their passing by, like the coral insects of the Southern seas, have by their lives wrought greatness and stability into an empire State.

After them there came the men who had made themselves distinguished in the war for independence and in the struggle of 1812. After the fitful fevers of their time, many of them chose their abodes with us and found the peaceful honors of the civic state.

For seventy-five years after the adoption of its first constitution by the State of Illinois its bench has been occupied by illustrious men. In those quiet regions where the mighty work of humanity is done, where the sound of passion is not heard and where the scales of justice are poised with true hands, there was an array of men of whom all the citizens of the State of Illinois are proud.

There sparkle the names of Breese, of Scofield, and of Walker, and there, too, is found the name of Davis, who was called from the circuit bench of Illinois to take his place upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and who, from that Olympian height, at a time when it seemed as if in the exultation of victory civic rights were to be destroyed, dared hold the ermine of the judge before the face of victorious faction, to reestablish the writ of habeas corpus, and all over the land to give a new birth to civil law and set again upon lasting foundations the rights of the citizen.

And at that same epoch, greatest of the great of the great Republic, from the civil ranks of the citizens of that State, came that man whom no partiality can overpraise, whom no detraction can lower, who needs no monument, but whose character, rising beneath the central dome of heaven, will stand forever as a high type of justice and at the same time of magnanimity—the man who was President of the United States during the civil war. [Applause.]

Up among the clouds that gathered in '60 and '61 rise to immortal heights Lincoln and Douglas, rivals in all their early lives, leaders on opposing sides of the vast hosts of freemen, whose children still honor them and whose remotest descendants will turn with reverence to where these reconciled rivals stand side by side in glory.

And by them another Illinoisan, the leader surrounded by his chosen chiefs, Logan and Ransom, Rawlins and Wallace, that leader who in the hour of exultation, from the midst of the clouds of war, could stretch forth in mercy the mailed hand of battle not unnerved by remorse, but strong and vibrant with the love of country, and say in tones that will find echo in every home while America endures, "Let us have peace!" [applause]; who could, from the stricken field of war, turn and give to the vanquished all that their manhood required, and all that the situation enabled him to bestow—the means of living and the rations from the haversacks of his soldiers.

These were among the sons of Illinois. These were men from whom a choice might well have been made for the statue that is to rise among the storied great of the Republic, but they need none. The world is their Pantheon, and time will be filled with the echoes of their fame. [Applause.]

I forbear to enumerate those who still abide with us. Great men of the State sit with the national judiciary, still add dignity to the debates and organization of the Senate and this House, and bring here in the advancing years the records of patriotic lives devoted wholly to the land and the people.

The State of Illinois has chosen Shields as its man for a reason that reaches to the philosophies of human life. It is because his character represented more fully the catholicity of American citizenship than that of any other man who had ever appeared in the annals of the Republic.

Our Government was founded upon the idea of equal and exact justice, the equality of all mankind, and that here against faction, against king, against intrigues, there should be a rallying point where humanity might stand and grow great enough to overthrow monarchy at such time as the contest came between Man and King.

And trust me, gentlemen, the Republic has not forgotten the lesson!

Born in a kingdom as he was, this man crossed the flaming gulf which separates despotism from liberty upon the bridge formed by the Declaration of the eternal rights of men. Coming among us voluntarily, he assumed all the burdens of citizenship; peaceful in time of peace, baring his breast among the foremost when the requirements of the country made sacrifice of life possible, he did all his work well and left an honored name; and Illinois presents him, Soldier, Citizen, Senator, and Jurist, as a representative of American citizenship. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution relative to the unveiling of the statue of Gen. James Shields in Statuary Hall; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

STATUE OF GEN. JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the first United States Senator from Minnesota was Gen. James Shields. He came to us of the trans-Mississippi Northwest in the formative period of our statehood, before our North Star was set in the constellation of the Federal Union.

We knew his history, as he had written it with his sword upon the battlefields of Mexico; we knew his political capabilities, as he had demonstrated them in the Senate as the colleague of Stephen A. Douglas. We knew the man. We recognized his robust integrity and fervid patriotism; we realized that with his persistent restlessness and his restless persistency he possessed qualities of inestimable value to our stripling State as it modestly entered the sisterhood of the Union.

For this we honored him and honored ourselves by conferring on him the first Senatorial commission which bore the great seal of our new-born State.

For ten months only he served us in this capacity. Ever restless and always migratory, he left us for a new home upon the Pacific coast. There he heard the echo of the first gun which opened upon Sumter. It needed no proclamation to summon James Shields to the service of his adopted country. A soldier of ability and of undoubted courage, he played his part in the great national tragedy with conspicuous fidelity and success.

To me the most marvelous thing in that war, and indeed in all the wars in which this country has been engaged, is the earnest patriotism and unflinching fidelity of those citizens who have come over the seas and made their homes with us. On every battlefield, in every regiment and squadron, these men won with their bayonets their title-deeds to American citizenship. [Applause.]

Among the names of her adopted sons whom America delights to honor for their heroism and devotion none shines with brighter luster than that of this stalwart Irishman, James Shields.

The great State of Illinois, always just and never ungrateful, with intuitive recognition of her indebtedness to the hardy pioneers of whom Gen. Shields was an accurate type, has to-day placed his among the statues which tenant the old House of Representatives.

There in the nation's Pantheon, if you please, he stands, amid the men who created, protected, and preserved the American Union. Others may be greater, more eloquent, abler, or more renowned, but none was truer than he.

On the opposite side of that ancient Hall, whose marvelous echoes are the wonder of the guided and misguided people who enter there, Vermont has chisled in everlasting marble the stalwart hero of her Green Mountains, whose gorgeous eloquence and emphatic sword compelled the surrender of Ticonderoga. Facing each other these sturdy veterans stand, fine specimens both of the citizen soldiery of two war epochs, the one native and the other foreign born, but both preëminently and altogether American; steadfast and reliable when put to the test, self-reliant, resourceful, and full of enterprise; not absolutely great, but always useful; positive rather than eloquent, magnanimous, but determined; at home only when abroad hewing the paths for the more refined civilization which follows after them, and in its dilettanteism neither knows nor suspects that the work of such men alone renders its progress possible; typical both of a pioneer race to whose vigorous manhood and restless activity the nation owes much of its strength and most of its development. James Shields and Ethan Allen! It is with such rugged bowlders as these that the foundations of empires are laid. He does not read history well who fails to recognize the influence and the necessity of such characters as these in the progress of the nations and the onward march of civilization.

To us of Minnesota, who knew him briefly indeed, but loved him well, it has seemed that the present was a fitting opportunity to add our modest tribute to the memory of our first or pioneer representative in the United States Senate; and, in behalf of that State, I sincerely trust that these resolutions shall pass unanimously. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks to substitute the Senate resolutions for the resolutions offered by himself.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of saying a word upon these resolutions until a minute or two ago; but as one of the soldiers of the late Confederacy who met Gen. Shields upon the battlefield, I desire to say a few words. On the first day of June, 1862, I was under the command of "Stonewall" Jackson, when we met the advance of Fremont from Romney, not far from Strasburg, in the Valley of Virginia. We turned back that advance, and after doing so retreated to the road we had left upon the heights; and for the first time I saw the army commanded by Gen. Shields in the distance upon the south side of the Shenandoah River, advancing for the purpose of cutting off the advance of Jackson up the valley.

Then for all the week there was a forced march by Jackson along that valley, with Fremont in his rear, an almost continuous engagement. Jackson was guarding 4,000 prisoners he had captured at Winchester and large herds of beef cattle and sheep and trains of wagons and other supplies. Shields was seen by our column several times, passing through Luray Valley, on the east side of the Shenandoah, endeavoring to effect a crossing for the purpose of intercepting Jackson and preventing his further advance up the valley. That was prevented only by the activity of Jackson's cavalry keeping ahead of Shields, burning and destroying the crossings of the Shenandoah River, until, on the 6th day of June, at Harrisonburg, when Jackson could proceed no further along the pike, because in his previous engagement early in the spring with Milroy at McDowell he had destroyed the bridge on the pike which led to Staunton. He then abandoned the pike, wheeled to the left, taking a dim little road to Port Republic, which was a small village in the forks of the Shenandoah River, several miles from that point.

On the 6th, the cavalry under the command of Fremont overtook the force under the command of Gen. Ashby and an engagement occurred, resulting in the death of Gen. Ashby and the capture of Sir Percy Windom, who commanded the Federal cavalry. From that point there was no activity until the morning of the 8th of June, when Fremont advanced and the battle of Port Republic took place, in which the Confederate force consisted mainly of Ewell's division and a part of the old division of Jackson. During this time Shields had made a circuit of the valley up the river so as to get before us, and he had a long march to make to reach Port Republic.

But he had pressed on until he had approached that village, and had he crossed his force into the forks of the two rivers and captured the bridge there was no escape for Jackson. He would have had an army in his rear and one in his front, and near the crossing of the river, with no road or bridge by which to escape; and it would probably have proved his destruction. He went personally with a part of his command, and before any of them had crossed the river he himself rode into Port Republic, a small village, and while he was reconnoitering the village a Federal captain commanding a battery had placed his guns at the foot of the bridge. He had crossed over the south fork and placed his guns so as to command the bridge completely. Jackson rode down and ordered him away, and the Federal officer, mistaking him for one of his own commanders for the time, started to obey, when Jackson, on his charger, darted like an eagle across the bridge, and was fired at with one of the guns, but, fortunately for him, without any effect. He then advanced

Gen. Talliaferro's brigade, who captured the bridge, effected a crossing, and, I believe, captured both of the guns.

The command I belonged to arrived when the battle was at its full height in the narrow plain between the mountain and the river on the east side of the south fork. We crossed over the bridge and then crossed the south fork upon a bridge constructed of wagons, a thing which had never occurred in the history of warfare, or was supposed never to have occurred, as most men understood, but I have since read that Gen. Lacourb, a very distinguished French general, considered the best commander of light troops in mountain warfare of his time, had accomplished the same thing a century before that. And by means of that bridge Jackson was enabled to get his forces across into the valley just in time to turn the result of the conflict. When I first beheld it there was no obstruction; our forces were being driven by those of Shields; a terrible conflict was going on by a Federal brigade, said to be composed of Irishmen, to the left at the foot of the hill where the celebrated Ringgold Battery (which had been used in Mexico) was playing upon our troops, and guarded by this brigade.

Our first brigade that assaulted them was broken and driven back. The guns were used with terrible effect across the plain to the river, slaying our men by hundreds at every discharge. It was there that I witnessed the formation of Dick Taylor's brigade of Louisianians and saw the charge that they made. He captured the guns, but they were recaptured and captured again, back and forth, three times, and one of the severest hand-to-hand conflicts of the war took place there. It was only by the brigade to which I belonged advancing and firing on the line immediately to Taylor's left that the Federal force was broken and the battery retaken the last time. That was the turning point of the conflict, and Shields was wounded and forced to retire. No man in the Federal Army ever commanded better or fought more valiantly than Gen. Shields did at the battle of Port Republic.

I happen to know about the relative strength of the forces. According to the reports, Shields had but 12,000 men, and Jackson had 13,000. Fremont had 20,000, but the bridge was in flames and he was compelled to witness from the heights on the north side of the river the defeat of Shields, who was driven away, but only after a battle which was greatly to his credit as a commander; and, from what I saw there, and from the knowledge of him that I have since acquired, I have entertained the greatest respect for the man, for his ability, and his character. He was a patriot and noble man. He was fighting in the cause of his country, and he believed as honestly and conscientiously in the cause that he was sustaining with his sword as I did in the cause in which I was engaged. I honor him and his memory as highly as though he had been upon my side. We were all Americans settling a great controversy between us which could never have been settled in any other way, and I heartily contribute these few words in honor of his memory upon this occasion. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions which I introduced on this subject be laid on the table, and that the concurrent resolutions which have passed the Senate and have just been received by the House be taken up and considered in its stead.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Senate concurrent resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That the thanks of Congress be tendered to the governor, to the Legislature, and to the people of the State of Illinois for the statue of Gen. James Shields, whose name is so closely identified with the history of Illinois and of the United States by his eminent services as a soldier, jurist, and statesman.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, and assigned to a place in Statuary Hall (the old Hall of Representatives), and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate and by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of Illinois.

The Senate resolutions were concurred in.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolutions were adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the ceremony of unveiling the statue of Gen. Shields will take place almost immediately in Statuary Hall. The governor of the State of Illinois and the commission under whose direction the statue was prepared, and also the governor of Minnesota, will be present. I have been requested by several members to move that the House do now adjourn in order that gentlemen may have an opportunity to witness the ceremony, which will occupy at least an hour. In compliance with these requests, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of Gen. Shields, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the result,

Mr. WOLVERTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for this day on account of sickness.

The house then (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to give notice at this time that on Monday next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move to take up for consideration Senate bill 412, known as the bill for the repeal of the existing Federal election laws. I will also state in this connection that House bill 2331, on the same subject, is now upon the table. I shall ask that the bill be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and I shall then ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill reported by me from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice that when that matter is up in regular order I shall move to refer the bill alluded to by the Senator from New York to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I ask leave to state now that the subject belongs to that committee by all the precedents of the Senate. There is a committee appointed to deal with that express class of subjects. It is a committee whose majority (to say nothing about the Republican members of it) is made up of very able and experienced lawyers. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. PUGH] is one member; the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is another, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is the chairman.

Now, at the late session, when no general legislation was expected to be entered upon and when the Senate was dealing with the great question of the currency, by what I am compelled to suppose was a mere inadvertence, in the absence of every Republican member of the Committee on the Judiciary but one, with no quorum present except constructively and by representation, the important bill referred to was authorized to be reported to the Senate. It never has been considered in the Judiciary Committee. The minority, according to the custom of that committee, which has always prevailed in the past when the Republicans were in power, were entitled to have a full opportunity to express their views and suggest modifications in committee. I very strongly hope and expect, from the well-known courtesy of the Senator from New York, without speaking of any other consideration, that before the Senate is asked to act upon that bill it will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PLATT. A similar bill has been pending before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HOAR. There was a bill introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], which he had very properly referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which it would naturally belong to him to look after when it came back. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] was absent, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] was absent, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was absent, and I was absent from the meeting of the Committee on the Judiciary when the report was authorized to be made. It was a mere inadvertence, I am sure.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, there is a bill before the Committee on Privileges and Elections now of a similar nature. It is the identical bill, verbatim, which was introduced by me over a year ago, and upon which I made some remarks on the 20th of last December. It is substantially the same as the House bill which the Senator from New York proposes to substitute for the Senate bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. Such bills I believe almost without exception are sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I had it referred there upon consultation with committeemen, believing that to be the proper committee for it, as the Senator from Massachusetts says. I acted upon that principle, and substantially the same bill as that which passed the other House, having been introduced by me here a year ago and spoken upon, is now before the Committee on Privileges and Elections awaiting its action, and I hope it will soon be reported back so that we may have it before us.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senator from New York whether the bill which he has reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee is accompanied by a written report or statement of reasons why the bill should pass?

Mr. HILL. There is no written report accompanying the formal report in favor of the bill. It was regarded, I assume, by the Judiciary Committee that the reasons for the passage of the bill were self-evident, and that it needed no elaborate or lengthy report to convince the Senate of the propriety of the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to discuss the question as to where the bill properly belongs, and I think there will be no controversy upon this side of the Chamber on the question as to the proper course to be pursued. I simply desire to say at present, and will postpone any further discussion of the subject until Monday next, that the original Federal election law was reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. There was no Committee on Privileges and Elections then.

Mr. HILL. That may be; but since the Committee on Privileges and Elections has been established amendments to that law have been reported by the Judiciary Committee also. I am frank enough to say that there are precedents on both sides, but there are more in favor of the Judiciary Committee than against it. But that is an immaterial question.

However, I can not allow the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts to pass without observing that there was present a majority of the Judiciary Committee when the bill was ordered to be reported. I think the record so expressly shows.

A Republican Senator was present. I asked him whether he desired delay, and he said he did not. He made no objection to a favorable report of the bill. I will not now say what he further stated on that occasion. The bill was reported favorably. Subsequently the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desired to have it understood that the minority of the committee did not concur in the report. From that day to the present three months nearly of actual session have been had. There has been no request whatever from a single member of the committee that the bill should be referred back. This is the first suggestion made at any time that the bill should be recommitted for the consideration of that committee.

I have assumed, sir, that to a great extent this is a political question. I have assumed that the minority of this body, or at least the greater portion of them, intend to oppose the bill. If a hearing was desired, it strikes me that it would have been better for some Senator upon the other side to have made the suggestion two months ago, and not to wait until the time has been reached for the bill to be brought up for consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York allow me a moment to call his attention to a fact?

Mr. HILL. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. When the election bill came over from the House of Representatives which the Senator now seeks to have substituted for his report, as the Chair will very well recollect and as the RECORD will show, I pointed out that the proper reference of that subject was to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and objected to the bill being sent to the Judiciary Committee. The suggestion was made, as some Senator was actually on the floor desiring to speak upon the silver question, that the bill should lie on the table for the time being, and that that matter should come up at a proper time. So the Senate had full notice two or three months ago of this view of mine about it.

Mr. HILL. I certainly was well aware of the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts that in his opinion the bill should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is not the point I now make. There is before this body a bill already pending involving the same question, and with reference to that bill no Senator has moved that it shall be referred back to the committee for a hearing. Personally I care nothing in regard to the question as to which committee has charge of the bill. I shall have no controversy upon that point. I simply desire to speed the measure, that is all, and on Monday next I will resume the discussion of the subject upon any proper motion which may be made.

Mr. PLATT. On the day, I think, after the report was made I took occasson to state that as a member of the Judiciary Committee I did not concur in it, and also that if I had been present at the meeting of the committee I should have recorded my objection to the report. I was unable to attend the meeting of the committee that morning because I was obliged to be with another committee, but as soon as I knew that the bill had been reported I stated in the Senate that I did not concur in it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate tendering thanks to the governor, the Legislature, and the people of the State of Illinois for the statue of Gen. James Shields.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3544) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries of offered lands; and

A bill (H. R. 4245) to amend an act pertaining to the United States courts in the State of Mississippi.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that it now consider the bill (S. 463) to reimburse the State of Nebraska the expenses incurred by that State in repelling a threatened invasion and raid by the Sioux in 1890–'91.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, through the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, to audit and pay the actual and necessary expenses incurred by and for the National Guard of the State of Nebraska, called into the service of that State by Governor Thayer in the year 1890 and 1891, to repel a threatened invasion and raid, then imminent, by the Sioux, on presentation by the governor or other proper authorities of said State of statements of the actual and necessary expenses incurred by said State for said purpose, accompanied, so far as possible, with the proper vouchers and satisfactory proof of the correctness thereof; and that the sum of $42,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the pay and allowances to the officers and enlisted men of said National Guard shall not exceed the pay and allowances of the Army of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report, which is not very long, be read.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, October 5, 1893, as follows:

This bill passed the Senate at the last Congress and was reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives. The committee report the bill favorably and adopt its last report, as follows:

"The Sioux Reservation, with its 18,000 square miles, occupied by about 22,000 Sioux Indians, is located in great part in South Dakota, along the northern border of Nebraska, and in part in the last-named State. Brave and warlike, and retaining much of their original savagery, they are a foe to be feared, and their outbreak or threat of war causes dreadful anticipation among all settlers in their vicinity. The events of the winter of 1890–'91 are too notorious and of too recent a date to need more than the faintest reference to them. Trouble threatened during all of the summer and fall of 1890, and in November was so imminent and a threat of such magnitude that, with Gen. Miles in command, a large body of United States troops was placed within striking distance of the hostile Indians.

"The whole border was greatly alarmed and many settlers fled from their farms, taking refuge in the towns in northwestern Nebraska. Indeed, such action was recommended by the officers of the Government, and the War Department distributed arms among the frontiersmen for their better protection. The latter part of December, 1890, after the battle of Wounded Knee and the retreat of about 4,000 hostile Indians to the Bad Lands, along White River, about 15 miles from the Nebraska line, a general Indian war, involving all the tribes of the powerful Sioux Nation, seemed unavoidable, and danger to life and property was great. On January 2, 1891, the governor of Nebraska ordered the First Brigade of the Nebraska National Guard to the frontier to coöperate with the United States troops under Gen. Miles. The First and Second regiments responded promptly, and under the command of Gen. L. W. Colby took positions as indicated in the following plan:

"These troops were moved by rail from different parts of the State, and Company A, light artillery, and Troop A, of cavalry, were placed and held in readiness to move. The headquarters of the brigade were established at Rushville, Nebr., and the danger was threatening for a distance of 150 miles east and west and for 30 miles north and south. Hundreds of settlers had fled from their homes, leaving their stock and property uncared for. At Chadron alone there were 130 families of settlers gathered in from the neighborhood, dependent upon the public for shelter and food, and much the same condition obtained in all the frontier towns. Gen. Colby established a line of fortified posts or camps north of the line of towns on the Elkhorn Valley Railroad, with a reserve force at each important town.

"The appearance of the State troops gave encouragement and confidence to the people, and the National Guard was a valuable adjunct to the troops of the Government stationed on the Indian reservation. Gen. Miles approved of the disposition of the State troops. Many of the settlers returned to their homes. Strict military discipline was maintained in all the camps, and the National Guard of Nebraska won additional credit by prompt, cheerful, and able performance of their duties. On January 12, 1891, Gen. Miles communicated with Gen. Colby that the Indians showed every disposition to comply with the orders of the authorities. He said: 'I feel that the State troops can now be withdrawn with safety, and desire, through you, to express to them my thanks for the confidence they have given your people in their isolated homes.'

"On January 13, Gen. Victor Vifquain, adjutant-general of Nebraska, wired Gen. Colby:

"'Your command will remain at the front until the lives and property of citizens are perfectly secured. Be more vigilant than ever; advise me daily. You will withdraw your command when everything is safe, not before.'"

"On January 14, with the approval of Gen. Miles, Gen. Colby moved the troops to their homes. The campaign was made in the depth of winter, in a country affording the severest of weather, and officers and soldiers vied with each other in the performance of their duty.

"The following letter, lately received from the adjutant-general of Nebraska, is self-explanatory:

"STATE OF NEBRASKA, OFFICE OF ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
"Lincoln, March 5, 1892.

"DEAR SENATOR: I mail you this day the report of the Indian campaign of 1890-'91, as submitted to the Legislature, duly certified to by the governor. The Legislature loaned the money, so to speak, until the Federal Government should refund the same. I call your attention to pages 17 and 19 for dispatches of Gen. Miles, especially page 17, the last sentence of which commences: 'I feel that the State troops can now be withdrawn with safety, etc.' This shows that the State troops were needed; that they did not go to a picnic in midwinter. The truth is that the position occupied by the Nebraska National Guard cut off the last chance for the escape of the Indians west of the Black Hills.

"The Legislature appropriated $37,200; I asked for $40,000. They thought they knew better than I did and they were mistaken; it will certainly take $42,000 to settle everything.

"I do not think that you wish to be burdened with one thousand different vouchers. The appropriation clause can read '$42,000, or as much thereof as necessary, the same to be at the disposal of the Secretary of War, to be paid to the State after the vouchers have been submitted to that official,' or words to that effect. We will then take steps to present the vouchers which I am now compiling for the purpose. Do you not think this the best way?

"I am, Senator, yours, respectfully,

"VICTOR VIFQUAIN,
"Adjutant-General.

"Senator CHAS. F. MANDERSON,
"Washington, D. C."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amounts of money have been paid in each year since January 1, 1873, to the United States district attorney for the southern district of New York other than payments on account of salary, as compensation for examining titles to lands, and as compensation in prize causes, and the authority for such payments.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I ask whether that resolution was reported by a committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No, sir; it was not reported by a committee. I offered the resolution, which merely asks for information.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator explain exactly what is meant by the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have reason to believe that there have been very large amounts of money paid for the last twenty years to the district attorney for the southern district of New York, and I have some question about the authority for the payments and why they were made. I want the information as to the amounts paid and on what authority they were paid by the Secretary of the Treasury. I offer the resolution to obtain the information I desire, and which I think will be of value to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas, as he is probably better informed than I am about it, whether the compensation paid in prize causes is not paid by an adjudication of the court from the fund for which the prize condemned is sold, and not from the Treasury. If that be true, should not the resolution include not only payments from the Treasury, but all other payments?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I will not make any motion——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I shall not make any objection to such a modification of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I merely ask the Senator if the resolution as it stands covers all he desires?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to making the resolution broader, and I am willing to modify it as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests.

Mr. HOAR. Putting in after the word "paid" the words "from any source."

Mr. HILL. I do not know of any objection to the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and will modify the resolution in that way.

Mr. HOAR. The record will probably show what has been paid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries of offered lands was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and

The bill (H. R. 4245) to amend an act pertaining to the United States courts in the State of Mississippi was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 3534) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senate Committee on Public Lands have reported a similar bill, which is Order of Business No. 84 on the Calendar. I have consulted with the chairman of the committee and with all the members of the committee, and it is agreed that there is no objection to the House bill, which only makes a formal change by adding "acts supplementary thereto," and "persons entitled to purchase," instead of "persons in possession." I ask, therefore, that the bill from the House of Representatives be taken up for consideration at the present time.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask the Senator if there is any difference between the two bills?

Mr. DOLPH. There is no difference, except the House of Representatives have added the date of the act of forfeiture and the several supplementary acts thereto, and instead of saying "persons in possession," they have said, for greater caution, "persons entitled to purchase." It is merely a formal change.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof, so as to extend the time within which persons entitled to purchase lands forfeited by the act shall be permitted to purchase the same in the quantities and upon the terms provided in section 3 at any time prior to January 1, 1897; but nothing herein shall be so construed as to interfere with any valid adverse claim that may have attached to lands or any part thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the House report on this bill, which is very brief, be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report referred to, submitted by Mr. ELLIS of Oregon, October 31, 1893, is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands have had under consideration House bill 3544, and find it to extend to such persons as are now authorized to purchase certain lands under the act of September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof, the permission to make such purchase at any time prior to January 1, 1897.

From the information before the committee we are satisfied that the failure to give persons entitled to purchase under the act referred to would work a great hardship upon a deserving people and doubtless be the means of many of them losing their homes.

It is well known that recently great financial distress has fallen upon the country, and that this condition has borne with especial hardship upon the settlers upon the frontier. In addition to being affected by the aforesaid condition, the information before the committee shows the parties interested have suffered from a partial failure of crops during the past few years, and taking into consideration that, by reason of the first-named consideration, men of wealth are so generally asking for an extension of time upon their current obligations, it is nothing more than simple justice and right that the poor settler who has taken upon himself the hardship of making a home upon the public domain should be extended the same lenity.

Your committee think the extension asked is a just one, and therefore report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

After the word "purposes" in the title of the bill, add "approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof."

After the word "purposes," in line 5, insert the words "approved September 29, 1890," and the several acts amendatory thereof."

In line 7, strike out the words "in possession of," and insert in lieu thereof the words "entitled to purchase."

And, in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, after the word "ninety-seven," in line 10, add the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with any adverse claim that may have attached to the lands or any part thereof."

With the foregoing amendments it is desirable that this bill should be promptly passed.

The committee appends the letters of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to this bill and S. 945, which is identically the same as House bill 3544.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 11, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by reference from the Department for report of House bill 3544, "To amend an act entitled 'An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.'"

This bill is identical with Senate bill 945, a report on which has this day been submitted, and I accordingly inclose a copy of said report as embodying the views of this office upon the subject.

The bill and the letter accompanying it are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 11, 1893.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt by reference from the Department for report of Senate bill 945, "To amend an act entitled 'An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.'"

This act proposes to amend section 3 of the act of September 29, 1890, known as the general-forfeiture act, so as to extend the time within which persons in possession of lands forfeited by said act shall be permitted to purchase the same in the quantities and upon the terms provided in said section to January 1, 1897.

Said section provided for the purchase by persons possessing certain qualifications as to citizenship, who were in possession of the lands under deed, written contract with, or license from the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed prior to January 1, 1888, or persons who had settled said lands with bona fide intent to secure title thereto by purchase from the grantee State or corporation, when earned by compliance with conditions and requirements of the granting act, of the land claimed by them not to exceed 320 acres, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, at any time within two years from the passage of the act. By act of February 18, 1891, it was provided that the two years within which the purchase must be made should begin to run from the date of the promulgation of instructions for the restoration to entry and disposal of the forfeited lands by this office. These instructions were given in a large number of the grants in February, 1891, but in cases where questions were pending necessary to be determined before the restoration could be made, the instructions were issued at various times, and in some cases they have not yet been issued.

By act of June 25, 1892, the time for purchase by claimants under said section 3 who were actual residents upon the land, was extended to September 30, 1893, and by act of January 31, 1893, the time within which persons entitled to purchase the forfeited lands on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oregon, was extended to January 1, 1894.

With the exception of the claimants opposite the forfeited portion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the rights of persons entitled to purchase under section 3 of the act of September 29, 1890, are governed by the acts of February 18, 1891, and June 25, 1892, those of persons in possession under deed, written contract with, or license from the grantee State or corporation by the former and actual residents who settled with bona fide intent to purchase from such grantee, by the latter.

Therefore, excepting in the case of claimants for the forfeited lands of the Northern Pacific road, and in the cases where the restorations have been recent, or not made at all, the time within which a preference right of purchase was allowed has already expired.

The bill under consideration proposes to extend the time for all claimants under section 3 to January 1, 1897, and by the passage thereof, uniformity, which is much to be desired, would be secured, and all claimants given equal rights. And as no one can be injured by its provisions, excepting possibly some persons who may have settled on the lands after the expiration of the time allowed for the purchase thereof, I think the bill should be passed with a proviso that nothing therein shall be so construed as to interfere with any valid adverse claim that may have attached to the land or any part thereof.

The copy of the bill transmitted by you is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the Senate bill on the same subject be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, Senate bill 945, on the same subject, will be postponed indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

FORT TOTTEN MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 171.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MANDERSON. Let the bill be reported by title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 171) granting to the State of North Dakota certain lands heretofore set apart as a wood reservation for Fort Totten military reservation for the use of the militia of North Dakota, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the reservation referred to in this bill is an abandoned military reservation which has passed under the general law into the control of the Interior Department?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. President, may I ask what was done with the bill (S. 341) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes, which is No. 13 on the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar is not being called in regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that the Calendar is not being called in regular order. The cases disposed of have been taken up by unanimous consent.

MARGARET KENNEDY.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 333) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BERRY, September 6, 1893:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 333) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy, report the same back to the Senate with a recommendation that the bill pass. The committee adopt the report made by Mr. ALLEN in the Fifty-second Congress (Senate Report 403), except no amendment is required to the present bill to make it conform to the recommendation made by the committee in the Fifty-second Congress.

[Senate Report No. 403, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred S. 448, for the relief of Margaret Kennedy, having had the same under advisement, respectfully make the following report:

Margaret Kennedy is the widow and sole executrix of John Kennedy, deceased. In his lifetime John Kennedy, a citizen of the District of Columbia, whose loyalty was unquestioned, owned a tract of 26½ acres of land on the northeast bank of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, in the District of Columbia. At the breaking out of the war the land was inclosed with a post-and-rail fence. A portion of the farm was cultivated to orchard, garden, flowers, and shrubbery. The remainder was covered with a growth of oak, pine, and chestnut forest. The land was taken possession of by the Government and used throughout the war for military purposes. Fort Sedgwick was erected upon it, around which rifle pits and other excavations were made, covering in all about 12 acres.

The effect of this military appropriation was practically to destroy the larger part of the tract of land as a farm, and for all purposes of cultivation. In the course of the occupancy of the land the fences were consumed by the Army as fuel; so, too, the orchard, consisting of several hundred fruit trees of many choice varieties which had come to bearing but three years before. The flowers and shrubs which were cultivated to meet the demands of the city market were completely destroyed. The occupancy continued until after the close of the war. The timber, covering many acres of the place, was of a choice and valuable quality, and commanded a good price for firewood, owing to the nearness of the farm to the market of this city. Competent witnesses placed the value of the land at $300 per acre, and the loss of the fruit trees, consisting of apple, cherry, peach, pear, and other fruit trees, with the smaller fruits, as high as $5,000; the value of the forest trees, situated as they were, at $4,500; and the value of the fencing at $1,000.

While the committee recognize the value of these premises, and the serious loss sustained by Mr. Kennedy by reason of their appropriation to military uses, they regard most of such injuries as the result of military necessity and for which compensation can not be allowed. Most of the timber grown upon this land was used in building the fortifications, and the remainder for fuel for the Army, or was sold by the Government. It was not a matter of military necessity to thus appropriate the timber, but simply the choice of taking it or purchasing other timber available for the purpose in market. Regarded simply as supplies made use of for the support of the Army or material required with which to construct the fort, the forests, orchards, and fences were worth $3,000 at the lowest estimate. For certain parts of these things an allowance of $1,378.44 was made and paid, which deducted from $3,000 leaves a balance of $1,621.56. The resulting damages to the real estate, as such, the committee decline to make any allowance for.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "ten," in line 6, and inserting the word "three," in lieu thereof, and that, after being so amended, it do pass.

Mr. MANDERSON. The reading of the report has shown the nature of this claim. Some years ago, in the early part of my service in this body, I was a member of the Committee on Claims, and my recollection is that the uniform practice of the committee had been not to report favorably on the payment of claims of this character. Where property was taken for the consumption of the Army in the District of Columbia, then, I think where cases of this character passed the scrutiny of the committee, a bill for their payment was passed by both Houses; but where it was a claim for the use of land or the taking of timber or going upon land for the purpose of erecting forts which surrounded the city of Washington, my recollection is that the uniform practice was to report against that class of bills. It may be that since that time there has been a change in the practice of the committee, and a change in the action of Congress in that behalf. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill whether there are precedents for this action?

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the bill does not propose to pay for the use of land, nor does it propose to pay for timber used in constructing forts, as I remember, but for timber a large part of which was used by the Army for firewood—fence-rails—which were taken by the Army and burned.

I will state to the Senator that this is an old claim. It passed Congress several years ago. In the shape in which it originally passed, the bill required the Quartermaster General to estimate the damages to which the claimant was entitled. Upon that report the claimant was allowed, I think, $1,300 or $1,100, I do not remember now which, of the amount of the claim, which was for $5,000. The Senator from Nebraska will see from the report that the actual damage was so many thousand dollars, but the committee does not propose to pay it, but only that portion which is usually paid for by the Army under similar circumstances.

A similar bill has been heretofore twice reported to the Senate and passed this body on two occasions. The amount which it is proposed to pay is sixteen hundred and odd dollars. Mr. Allen, the then Senator from Washington during the last Congress, made the report, and the committee at this time simply adopt the report made by Mr. Allen. The bill passed the Senate during the last Congress, but failed to pass the other House.

Mr. MANDERSON. The bill proposes, then, to pay nothing except for that which was used by the Army directly?

Mr. BERRY. The bill proposes to pay nothing else. The committee decline to recommend the balance of the claim, which amounts to much more.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator explain a little more fully how it is that this matter has passed two or three Congresses and payments have been made upon the claim in pursuance of bills passed by Congress, and now another amount is required to be paid? I did not exactly catch his statement.

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that a bill did pass Congress, the amount of damages not being specified, but referring that question to the Quartermaster-General for a statement of the value. He reported certain values for this property, for which it was admitted the Government was liable; but his report was so grossly unjust, as was believed by the committees which have since examined it, as to the amount which should be paid for the fence rails, that they have reported in favor of giving the amount proposed in this bill as an additional sum to that which the Quartermaster-General reported and for which Congress appropriated.

For instance, there was testimony taken as to the price of cord wood at that time, and, as overwhelmingly shown by the proof before the committee, the amount estimated by the Quartermaster-General for cord wood was not the price of cord wood, and was no compensation for the property taken. There is no dispute about that, and no member of the committee will contend that the estimate of the amount allowed was adequate or in full payment of the claim. That is the reason the committee propose to pay the sum reported in the bill.

The damages were even far beyond those which will be paid by this bill to these parties. They have been kept out of the money now for twenty-five or thirty years, and the committee were of the opinion that the report of the Quartermaster-General was beyond question contrary to all the proof which has since been taken as to the value of wood at that time, and that it was just and fair that this additional allowance should be made. Therefore the bill was favorably reported.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator if, when the comparison was made between the new proof and the judgment of the Quartermaster-General, the Government or the Quartermaster-General was in any way represented so as to adduce the evidence on which he acted?

Mr. BERRY. I can not say as to that. The testimony which was taken by the Quartermaster-General was not before the committee or considered by me, except his statement. He simply made a statement that he found the value so and so; but the testimony was afterwards taken of merchants here and of a large number of disinterested persons as to the price of the material at that time, which showed that the Quartermaster-General had certainly underestimated. For instance, I think he only allowed, as I now remember, $2 a cord for cordwood. The proof from all the testimony showed that it was worth from $8 to $10 a cord at that time. I remember that one item in regard to the value of cordwood in the year 1864 and 1865, I think it was, here in the city of Washington. I am very clearly of the opinion, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion, that this bill will not begin to compensate the party in truth and in fact for anything like the amount of property which was destroyed or the injury inflicted; and they came to the conclusion as to that part of the claim for which the United States was in the habit of paying, that it would be just to allow this additional sum of sixteen hundred and odd dollars.

I am inclined to think that the Senator from Massachusetts was a member of that committee when a similar bill was reported at a former session of Congress. It was reported, I know, during the last session, and I am decidedly of the opinion that it was reported at the preceding Congress. It has been twice reported by the Committee on Claims while I was not a member of the committee, but it was reported after a very careful examination by the Senator from the State of Washington, Mr. Allen, during the last Congress.

Mr. HOAR. The only question in my mind as to the principle is this: I understand the well-settled policy of the legislative department of the Government to be that the occupation of land or the destruction of what makes up the value of real estate by military occupation is not a matter for which the Government is bound to make compensation to its citizens. It is a part of defense against a public danger, and the condition of having the property occupied for such defense as it is by having property injured by the marching of armies across the country is a condition on which all real estate is held by the citizen; but where military supplies were taken for the Army by the military authorities, there the value of the supplies to the Army is allowed, as, for instance, if a valuable and costly dwelling house were taken for fuel its value as fuel is paid the citizen, and that is all.

But the question here is whether Congress ought to go behind the report of the Quartermaster-General, Congress having once referred the question to the Quartermaster-General and the citizens having accepted the Quartermaster-General's report. I suppose there are millions upon millions of claims which have been adjudicated in the Quartermaster-General's Office and paid, where the person who received the pay thinks the allowance was exceedingly small and unjust.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me one moment?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my statement. It must be a very gross and peculiar case indeed, a claim so strong that Congress would be satisfied, if the matter were sent back to the Quartermaster-General he would himself concede he had made a mistake, to warrant such legislation as is proposed. If the Senator from Arkansas, on his responsibility as a member of the committee, a gentleman in whose judgment as a lawyer we all confide, says that, on the examination of the question, he is satisfied it is a case so clear that if it were sent back to the Quartermaster-General's Department, he could come to but one conclusion, and that that a mistake had been committed, I will not interpose an objection, nor do I wish to be understood that we are making a precedent for any other case.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that when the parties received the sum that was allowed by the Quartermaster-General, they received it under protest, and the receipt shows that they were unwilling to accept it as a final settlement. I will state, furthermore, what was my own judgment, and I think in it the committee agree with me. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], is present. The testimony which was taken showed to my mind clearly that the estimate put upon the property by the Quartermaster-General was not only inadequate but grossly inadequate.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas one question. Either he or the chairman of the committee can answer. Does the committee, as at present constituted, so far as the Senator from Arkansas understands its purpose, mean to reopen all the judgments of the Quartermaster-General in cases in the past alike to this, where the party can show by ex parte testimony that there was a mistake and that the old allowance was too small?

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the committee has no such purpose, nor are there any cases of this kind peculiarly, because this case was referred by Congress to the Quartermaster General. It is not a case where he estimated at the time and paid for property, but it was referred to him to take testimony. It is a peculiar case within itself, and there is no desire, or disposition, on the part of the committee, or any member of it, I think, to go back and reëxamine the questions which were settled long ago.

Mr. HOAR. I propose, on the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, to support the bill, but I wished to have on record at this early period in the Congress the declaration which the Senator has just made, because the Senator will see that it is a matter of vast importance.

Mr. BERRY. I have one word more to say, Mr. President. This is not alone the action of the present committee, but we simply followed the action of the committee as organized in the last Congress, when it was presided over by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who is now present in the Chamber.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Claims now, and in the last Congress I happened to be chairman of the committee. I was not present in the Senate when the pending bill was considered or reported at the late extraordinary session. I was present when a similar bill was under consideration in the last Congress. The bill at that time was assigned to Senator Allen of Washington, who was then a member of the Senate and a member of the committee, and it was carefully investigated by him, as all cases were carefully investigated that were referred to him. It was, on his report, examined with more than ordinary care by the full committee, owing to the fact that it proposed to reconsider a matter which had really been passed upon before, on a report made by the Quartermaster-General.

My recollection of the case is in accord with the statements just made by the Senator from Arkansas. I think it was the deliberate conclusion of every member of the committee that the report of the Quartermaster-General in connection with the testimony before the committee showed conclusively on their face that the allowance made by the Quartermaster-General was grossly erroneous, to say the least. As a matter of course, it has not been the custom of the Committee on Claims to reconsider and open cases which have been adjudicated either by the Court of Claims or by the Quartermaster-General; but in this particular case there seemed to the committee to have been an injustice done by the previous action, and it was the unanimous opinion of the committee at the last Congress that it was no more than an act of simple justice that an additional allowance should be made this claimant.

Mr. HOAR. A case strong enough to reverse the decision of a court?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, sir; I considered it myself a case so strong as to have justified a court to set aside the verdict, as would have been the case in a judicial court. This is not a case where property was taken through military necessity. It is a case simply as to the choice upon the part of military commanders in the purchase of property that was needed by the Army. It could have been purchased at perhaps a hundred other places, but was taken off this farm and used for the benefit of the Army. The claim is not for the destruction of trees, or anything of that kind. So, taking it altogether, I am inclined to think that the bill is right and ought to receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not know but this is a fair valuation of the property, but when the matter has been to the Quartermaster-General and he has fixed a valuation upon it and there is no claim that he has not fairly considered the question of value of the property, it seems to me rather a harsh proceeding to pass a bill which says the Quartermaster-General in considering the case did not allow half what the property was worth. It appears to me there ought to be some evidence on this subject. We ought not to take it for granted that the Quartermaster-General, when the claimant acquiesced in the reference of the claim to him, was so grossly unjust as not to allow half the Government ought to pay, without any evidence as to the value which the Quartermaster-General specifically put upon the property. We are simply asked to say that the Quartermaster-General, to whom this matter was referred, has not allowed half enough. It seems to me we ought to have a little more investigation of the subject. There were but 26½ acres in all the farm, and the report says:

> The land was inclosed with a post and rail fence. A portion of the farm was cultivated to orchard, garden, flowers, and shrubbery. The remainder was covered with a growth of oak, pine, and chestnut forest.

The report does not state what proportion of the 26½ acres was covered with forest, but it does state that the value of the forest trees was $4,500 and the value of the fencing $1,000. I do not know but that is true. However, it is rather a remarkable value to place upon forest trees growing upon a portion of a farm of 26½ acres, a considerable portion of which is cultivated. Then the report says:

> Most of the timber grown upon this land was used in building the fortifications, and the remainder for fuel for the Army, or was sold by the Government.

Then, competent witnesses having placed the value of the forest trees at $4,500, and the value of the fencing at $1,000, the committee think they were worth $3,000. I submit that anywhere within 3 or 4 miles of the Capitol in the District of Columbia it would be pretty difficult to sell on the stump trees growing on a portion of a farm of 26½ acres for $3,000.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that it included a large amount of post and rail fence. Besides, a part of the trees were fruit trees; they were apple trees.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know much about post and rail fences, but I venture to say that a new post and rail fence could be built around 26½ acres of land for less than a thousand dollars.

Mr. BERRY. But taking the orchard itself and the timber sold off the land, I think instead of being an overestimate it is far under the real value at that time.

Mr. PLATT. But the point I make is that after the matter has once been referred to the Quartermaster-General and he has upon evidence said what he thought was the value of the property taken, which the Government ought to pay for, we ought not to say in this hot haste that he did not estimate it justly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator kindly read the prior law?

Mr. PLATT. The act of October 19, 1888, is as follows:

> That the Quartermaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain and state the value of all timber, fences, and fruit trees on the farm of John Kennedy, deceased, situate in the District of Columbia, upon which Fort Sedgwick was erected, taken, and used for firewood by the Army of the United States, and also the value of all timber sold by the Government which had been taken from said farm and used in the construction of said fort. And the amount so stated shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to Margaret Kennedy, the widow and sole executrix of John Kennedy, deceased.

Mr. CHANDLER. With all due deference to the Committee on Claims, I am obliged to conclude as a reason for my own vote that the judgment of the Quartermaster-General that $1,378.44 was the value of the property is a better judgment than that of the committee that it was $3,000. The estimate of the committee is $3,000 in round numbers, and the careful and accurate sum made up by the Quartermaster-General, $1,378.44, being taken out, the committee propose to pay the claimant $1,621.56. I think under the circumstances of this claim the claimant ought to be content with what she had received. She had her bill; she had her adjudication; and she has received the amount.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. My information is that the Quartermaster-General fixed an estimate of the supposed value of a certain number of cords of wood used for fuel. Is not that the fact of the case?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Arkansas states that, I have no doubt it is.

Mr. BERRY. That is the exact fact.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Arkansas upon my left says that is the exact fact. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from New Hampshire if they think cutting down and consuming a large orchard of choice and valuable fruit, and estimating it as cordwood, and paying for it simply at the supposed value of so many cords of wood for fuel, even approximates the measure of justice this Government should render to the person whose orchard the Government had thus destroyed?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will make to the Senator from Tennessee the same answer I have made before. The claimant came here; the bill was reported; it passed Congress, and presumably by the will and wish of the claimant an adjudication was made by the Quartermaster-General, and he found so many cords of wood used, of a certain value, so many dollars and so many cents; and now Congress is asked to intervene and upon the judgment of the committee fix the value that ought to be paid this woman at $3,000. I submit that it is a very dangerous way to legislate upon such claims. I submit that it is dangerous for Congress to undertake to take up such claims and appropriate a round number, $2,000, $3,000, $4,000, and $10,000 to pay to parties who received injuries to their property by reason of the war for the Union.

Mr. President, I do not think I have ever voted upon a yea-and-nay vote for the passage of any bill of this kind. I do not believe that it is a wise policy for the Government to pay war damages. It is not pretended in this case that when the farm was occupied by the military forces of the United States and the property which is now to be paid for was used, that any accurate account was kept of the timber that was cut and used. The destruction and use of the timber was part of the total damage and destruction which the military occupation of the property occasioned and there was no specific account made of what was done. There was no quartermaster's certificate issued, I understand; and at this time, thirty years after the military occupation, the Congress of the United States is asked to estimate that $3,000 worth of cord wood and of timber fit to be used in the fortifications was taken from this estate, which in equity and in good conscience the United States ought to pay for because the claimant was a loyal woman, or because her husband was a loyal citizen of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not believe in this class of claims. I do not believe in opening the Treasury to cases of this sort. I believe the rule should be adopted that damage done by military forces during the war should not be paid for from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the rule now. The Committee on Claims has reported no such bill as that since I have been a member of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I dissent from the system which has grown up, even if it has the high sanction of the Committee on Claims, of turning the taking of property for military use, and the occupation of real estate for military use, and the doing of damage to real estate and to personal property into some kind of a purchase of that property for the use of the Government of the United States.

I do not believe that it ever was wise to pay any of these claims; and I do not believe in what I regard as in some sort a legal subterfuge by which, when a piece of property was occupied, the fences destroyed and burned, the trees cut down and used for fortifications and for fuel, the Government is put into the attitude of having purchased the property and is now to be asked to pay for it. For one, I dissent entirely from that doctrine and that practice.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, just a word. One listening to the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire would imagine that it has been the custom of the Senate and of Congress to pay a class of claims which have never been recognized by any committee of this body and have never been recognized by the Senate nor by Congress. Nobody has ever proposed, so far as I know, to pay for trees, fences, flowers, and other ornamentations destroyed by the Army in time of war. That is not this case at all. This is a case where it is proposed to pay a loyal citizen for certain trees and fences alleged to have been taken by the Army and used for the benefit of the Army while engaged in an effort to put down the rebellion.

Mr. HOAR. At their value, for the use.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. At the value at the time they were taken for the use to which they were put; that is to say, if apple trees were taken for fuel, no greater value is put by the committee upon those apple trees than if they had been ordinary trees from the forest. The value placed upon the property taken is the value for the use to which the property was put. That is this case. I admit that it is a delicate matter and one that ought to be approached with a great deal of caution to open up a case which has once been acted upon. I concede that all which has been said by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to that matter has been well said; but the committee did consider this to be an exceptional case.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask him whether he does not think, when we are called upon to reverse the action of the Quartermaster-General, that we ought at least to have a statement of the account, what the Quartermaster-General allowed, and the value he put upon the articles, and whether we ought to reverse it without any statement as to what his valuation was?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I confess it would have been better if the report had been more elaborate and more specific and had given all the information to the Senate. That would have been better, I concede. However, all those matters were before the committee and they were considered, as I remember, with more than ordinary care, owing to the fact that the case had been passed upon at one time. I know it was the judgment of all the members of the committee that from some cause an injustice had been done this party in the failure on the part of the Quartermaster-General to allow even one-half of what the committee believed from the testimony on file ought to have been allowed for the property taken and used by the Army in this particular case. My memory does not serve me fully, and I am not certain whether the act of Congress submitting this case to the Quartermaster-General did not restrict him to a certain extent.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am not sure how the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster-General was restricted, and although I would not speak certainly on that point, some items were perhaps omitted from consideration by the Quartermaster-General. At all events, my memory is very distinct that after a very thorough examination of the matter a year ago it was the deliberate judgment of every member of the committee that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, this is an exceptional case. It has been a case of great difficulty. It has been before the committee a number of times, and the conclusion which was reached in the bill now before the Senate was reached during the last Congress. The report was made by our former colleague, Mr. Allen of Washington, a very careful and accurate man and a good lawyer. It was made after a very thorough and exhaustive examination of the case. His report might have been a little fuller, but the matter was before the committee at a number of its sessions and great care was taken before the report of the committee was finally agreed upon.

This man Kennedy in his lifetime lived in the District of Columbia within sight of the Capitol during the war, at a time when he was fully entitled to the protection of the United States Government. He had no connection whatever with the Confederate cause, but lived in the District. His property was damaged probably ten times the amount that can be recovered under the laws and the rules of the committee, for the committee are only authorized to grant recovery for so much material as was actually used for quartermaster's stores. If the report had been read throughout it would have been seen that this limitation was placed upon the recovery in the present instance. The committee say expressly in the last lines of the report:

> The resulting damages to the real estate, as such, the committee decline to make any allowance for.

When this matter came before the Senate some years ago, long before I was a member of the Senate or of the Committee on Claims, it was referred to the Quartermaster-General and a report was made, and some $1,300 or more paid. But the parties were never satisfied with that allowance. Mr. Kennedy is dead, and the widow now living is a poor woman. She never was satisfied with the amount, and has been knocking at the doors of Congress since then for further relief; and the committee, on examining into the facts, became satisfied that the amount granted to her by the Quartermaster-General was insufficient.

Mr. DOLPH. What was that amount?

Mr. PASCO. The amount was some $1,300.

Mr. DOLPH. How much more does the committee propose to give her?

Mr. PASCO. The committee decided that instead of $1,300 she ought to have received $3,000, the market price of the timber that was destroyed, taking the market price of it as cord wood.

Mr. CHANDLDR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PASCO. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. How did the committee reach a conclusion that the round sum of $3,000 was the amount which under the rule laid down this woman was entitled to receive?

Mr. PASCO. It was based upon the estimated number of cords of wood and the amount that should have been allowed per cord.

Mr. DOLPH. What amount was proposed to allow her per cord?

Mr. PASCO. I can not give the figures because they are not in the report, and an exhaustive discussion of the matter this morning was not anticipated; but, as I said before, the report was made by one of the most careful members of the committee. I stated before the Senator from Oregon came in that the report was made by Mr. Allen of Washington. It was a matter he had before him for a number of weeks. He went over the matter again and again, and finally concluded that the number of cords of wood taken at the market price was worth fully $3,000, and that was fixed as the amount that should be recovered. The difference between the $1,300 allowed by the Quartermaster-General and $3,000 is the amount that he reported should be granted to her. That is the amount contained in the bill, and it is the amount the committee propose to give this poor widow for the wood taken from her husband's land.

The committee are very careful with reference to any matter that has been reported upon by one of the Departments, and it was only upon abundant evidence in the opinion of the committee that they decided that the report of the Quartermaster-General should be opened. It is an exceptional case. The action of the committee during the last Congress was unanimous with reference to the matter. The report now brought in by the committee, submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], copies in full, as will be seen from the head of it, the report made by the Senator from Washington in the last Congress.

I say this because there seems to be a suggestion or an intimation thrown out that there is a disposition on the part of the committee under their present organization to take a different view of cases of this kind from what had been taken in years gone by. But there has been no change in the policy of the committee. This is simply the same report that was made during the last Congress; and the lines which the committee have followed in the past will necessarily be the lines that will be followed during the present organization of the committee. We are governed by the laws and regulations which have been made relating to such claims.

This is not properly a Southern war claim in any sense of the word. This man lived in the District of Columbia. As I said before, he lived within sight of the Capitol. There was no reason at all why his property should have been taken for war purposes, and it was ruin and destruction to his little home here in the District to strip him of his fruit trees and of the trees around his place for army purposes. If the poor widow gets $1,600, in round numbers, as the committee now proposes, it will be scant justice for the great injury done to her husband and to her husband's estate, and to her as the beneficiary.

There can be no doubt that the claim is a just and a fair one. The amount this poor woman gets will be small in comparison with the injury which her family has suffered; and although the report is not as full as it might have been, there can be no doubt but that it is a fair and a just claim.

The Senator from Connecticut spoke of the hot haste with which this matter is being brought up. Certainly the haste has not been so very great. Thirty years have elapsed since the damage was done, and this poor woman has been knocking at the doors of Congress for years to get relief. Her bill was passed in the Senate at the last Congress, and she is now here again endeavoring to get relief. Certainly there has been no haste. The case has been on the Calendar for many weeks. There has been ample time for every Senator to examine into the justness of the claim, if Senators were not satisfied with the report of the committee, and I trust there will be no delay in the action which the Senate may see fit to take with reference to the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Notwithstanding the care with which the Committee on Claims have examined the bill I still think it would be a dangerous precedent for the Senate to adopt. I know that the Senator from Florida, the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Arkansas, and also the late Senator from Washington, Mr. Allen, are careful in all investigations which they make into cases which come before them; and if the Senate is to vote upon the guess of any committee, that $3,000 is a sum about right to give to this woman, then I would sooner act upon their guess than upon that of any other body of men whatever.

But I still say that the Senate ought not to pass a bill giving this round sum when the claimant has had the passage of a bill by Congress and a deliberate adjudication as to the value of the property by the Quartermaster-General. The law of October 19, 1888, for the relief of Margaret Kennedy, is explicit. It authorizes and directs the Quartermaster-General "to ascertain and state the value of all timber, fences, and fruit trees on the farm of John Kennedy, deceased, situate in the District of Columbia, upon which Fort Sedgwick was erected, taken, and used for firewood by the Army of the United States, and also the value of all timber sold by the Government which had been taken from said farm and used in the construction of said fort." Thereupon it directs that the amount shall be paid to Margaret Kennedy, the widow of John Kennedy.

That was in 1888, five years ago. The examination has been made by the Quartermaster-General. There has been evidently a careful and minute ascertainment of the facts, and the Quartermaster-General reported $1,378.44 as the value of the property taken. That amount was paid to Mrs. Kennedy, and now it is proposed to pay her $1,621.56 more, in order to make the amount received by her in round numbers $3,000. I think that the Committee on Claims ought not to ask us thus to overrule the deliberate judgment of the Quartermaster-General as to the value of the property without more minute and specific evidence upon which to substitute their judgment for that of the Quartermaster-General.

But I again recur to my main objection to the payment of this kind of a claim. The Senator from Florida says that this man and his property were within sight of the Capitol at Washington, and I therefore infer the Senator meant to suggest that the capital had not been the seat of war, so that the taking of property by the Army within the District of Columbia would not be an act of military appropriation. This very property was occupied, as the act of 1888 shows, for Fort Sedgwick. When war was flagrant there were half a dozen or a dozen military fortifications in the vicinity of the capital; and I had an idea that, notwithstanding all those fortifications, the forces of the United States at the capital were in considerable danger of capture at one time. Yet the Senator from Florida wishes us to conclude that because there was a military occupation of the grounds upon which Fort Sedgwick was erected it was not a military taking within the meaning of that term. Take the language of the report which was made in the last Congress and let us see whether the Government can afford to go on paying twice claims of this description. The report sets out the fact that—

> The land was taken possession of by the Government and used throughout the war for military purposes. Fort Sedgwick was erected upon it, around which rifle pits and other excavations were made, covering in all about 12 acres.
> The effect of this military appropriation was practically to destroy the larger part of the tract of land as a farm, and for all purposes of cultivation. In the course of the occupancy of the land the fences were consumed by the Army as fuel; so, too, the orchard, consisting of several hundred fruit trees of many choice varieties which had come to bearing but three years before.

There was nothing but a military occupation and a military taking possession of the land to build a fort upon it, taking possession of the timber to put in the fortifications, and cutting down the trees and building fires to keep the Union soldiers warm; and, for all I know, when Gen. Early approached the city some of the fuel may have been used to keep the Confederate forces warm, before Gen. Wright and the Sixth Corps made it so hot for them that they concluded to retire.

Now, Mr. President, to evolve from this sort of a military taking a contract obligation or an equitable obligation on the part of the United States to pay for the tree sthat were cut down at that time seems to me to be an unwise use of legislative power. Mark the language of the report and the theory upon which the United States is to pay for this military damage and destruction and consumption of property:

> Most of the timber grown upon this land was used in building the fortifications, and the remainder for fuel for the Army, or was sold by the Government. It was not a matter of military necessity to thus appropriate the timber, but simply the choice of taking it or purchasing other timber available for the purpose in market.

If all the operations of the Army are to be judged by that rule, and wherever we find that the Army erected a fort and cut down trees and used them for fortifications and for fuel the Government must pay the bill as if it had purchased the property on the ground, because if it had chosen to do so it might have gone and purchased timber somewhere else and hauled it to the ground and then erected the fortification—if this is to be the rule, as seems to be considered by the report which the Senator from Washington made in the last Congress and which is adopted by the committee in the present Congress, certainly there will be many thousands, not to say many millions, of dollars that will have to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States in order to recompense loyal citizens of the United States for what I conceive to be, notwithstanding the glosses that are put upon the transaction in the report of the committee, nothing but military occupation and the destruction or use for military purposes of property found at the seat of war.

Mr. President, I say I am aware that some claims of this kind have passed. I have never voted for one of them. I do not intend to vote for one of them upon any issue made in the Senate. I do not believe that the condition of the Treasury or the condition of the country is such that it is wise to make haste to put this class of claims upon the Calendar of the Senate, and when a claimant of this kind has been once paid all that she is entitled to receive by some other adjudication to ask that we shall give her by act of Congress as much more as a committee of Congress may guess she ought to have in equity and justice.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, instinctively I am inclined to oppose all claims of this kind. I would, if I had the power, adopt a constitutional rule of limitation, so that at some time we would hear the last of claims made by citizens for damages done and for property taken during the war. The only reason why I take part in the discussion now is because upon the facts I expect to vote for the bill, and I desire to state the reasons which influence me, not only to justify myself for my vote, but to exclude any possible conclusion that I would go further than this case suggests.

The facts as I understand them are that John Kennedy was a citizen of the District of Columbia, over which the United States had not only legal but actual jurisdiction during the war. That he was loyal is stated in the report, and being within this District he would be presumed by public law as well as the law of the land to be loyal, because he was not living within a district which had been recognized as disloyal by the authorities of the United States. The case is one very much the same as if he had lived in New York, or Illinois, or New Hampshire. The necessities of the Army were such that his lands, the lands of a peaceable, loyal citizen, were occupied from military necessity or public necessity. I hold beyond all doubt that for mere consequential damages a peaceable citizen of the United States must submit; but in a case where the property of the citizen has been taken and applied to public uses, whether taken by judicial condemnation or by the brief methods of military condemnation, the public obligation to pay for the property taken and used and applied to the purposes of the Government is complete.

Congress at a former session recognized the justice of this claim. It recognized its general propriety, and directed that an estimate should be made of the actual losses sustained by this peaceable citizen whose property was taken and converted to public uses by the authorities of the United States. It is not now an open question as to whether the claim is well founded or not, because Congress recognized it by creating a tribunal with limited jurisdiction to determine the amount which shall be paid. The parties appeared presumptively before this commissioner, a quasi judicial officer. They offered their testimony and he made his report. It was not judicial, but only quasi judicial.

The claimant, the representative of a loyal citizen living in this District, makes an application to Congress now simply that an investigation may be instituted which will determine the amount of the actual value of the property taken by the Government in the manner I have described. It was referred to an intelligent—as we are all supposed to be intelligent—committee of this body. That committee made an examination upon the testimony, again examined that testimony, and the crucial point was suggested by a question asked by the Senator from Massachusetts of the Senator from Oregon, "Was this evidence such as would have authorized a new trial in a judicial proceeding?" The Senator answered, "It was." Then this application is that Congress shall give to this claimant the benefit of a rehearing under circumstances where a rehearing or new trial is a right, and that the Senate shall make an appropriation, which is according to the report of the committee of this body which has complete jurisdiction over the subject as the representative of the Senate.

Now, shall the claim be paid? Why not? It is argued that it is an example of many claims which may hereafter be presented. I confess that that is true, but theoretically it is an example of a class of claims which ought to be paid, because it is for the property of a citizen not living within a State which was declared to be in insurrection or in rebellion, but in a community under the complete and exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, protected by all consitutional rights by which property is so carefully guarded.

If it had been proposed to take this property for any civil purpose, no one would claim that it could have been taken without a judicial condemnation and full compensation, It was taken by a public authority as distinctly as where judicial condemnation was imposed, and the duty of making compensation seems to me as clear as if it had been taken for any civil purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator to state his opinion so broadly that he would be willing in all cases to have the United States pay for all the trees cut down to make fortifications and used for fuel for the Army during the whole rebellion and wherever the taking may have happened?

Mr. PALMER. I should not; but I would be in the condition of a reluctant debtor admitting the obligation, but disliking to pay it exceedingly. I am putting this upon the distinct ground that the citizen living within the actual, as well as the legal, jurisdiction of the United States, having done no act to forfeit his right to protection, and his property being taken for public uses and distinctly appropriated to public purposes, demands the payment of its mere money value. Can that be resisted upon any legitimate ground?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, certainly if it is a military taking and destruction. Now, I ask the Senator whether he draws any distinction as to places, whether the property should be paid for because it happened to be in the District of Columbia and should not be paid for if it happened to be in the State of Texas?

Mr. PALMER. There is a very wide distinction in my mind. We have made exceptions in favor of presumptively loyal persons in the jurisdiction of States and compensation has been allowed to them under a great many circumstances, but in a hostile country the burden of proof is upon the claimant, because the legal conditions were such that all were presumed to be disloyal, and the burden of proof would be cast upon everyone or anyone to establish loyalty.

I come back again to the main point. I deprecate the going back a quarter of a century in respect of the possible and actual injuries which grew out of the war. With my present convictions, I should not favor the payment of property taken in any of the States which, by their own acts, were in opposition to the authority of the United States; but in this District the people were all loyal to the Government, and this property was taken precisely as if it had been distinctly taken for a civil purpose.

I have but very little to add to what I have said. My own purpose now is most distinct. While I avow my readiness to support the pending bill upon well-established principles, as I think, I am anxious to protect myself from such inferences as have been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I make a clear distinction, first, between the inhabitants of loyal districts or States or Territories, and the inhabitants of States which were in recognized rebellion. I make a clear distinction between the mere consequential injuries which result from military occupation and the value of the property actually taken and used of a loyal, peaceful citizen, one who is entitled to the protection of the Government and is under no obligation to contribute to the Government other than such as applies to every other citizen, with this accidental exception, where the land of a citizen may be favorable for purposes of offense or defense in military operations. In that case I assume that he must submit to that purely incidental consequence; but where his property is taken, whether it is personal property—for I can suppose that to be true, as the wants of the Army might require that his cribs should be emptied, and that his stock should be taken and slaughtered; all those things happen—the right to compensation, he being under no other obligation to contribute except the incidental necessity calls upon him, I can see no reason why he should not be paid. It was our practice during the war when in States which were not in legal opposition to the Government, where property was taken to pay for it upon the very simple ground that those persons were contributing their due proportion by the payment of taxes and military service to the defense of the Government, and that it was unreasonable and unjust to impose upon them any exceptional hardships growing out of the fact that they resided near a defensive or offensive point needed for military operations.

I therefore vote for this bill upon the distinct ground that this was a peaceable citizen in the peaceable possession of his property, which was taken by the authority of the United States Government for public purposes, and from that results the obligation of the public to pay for it its reasonable value; and, secondly, upon the ground that Congress has recognized this claim and made some provision for its payment. By an appeal to Congress the representative of this citizen asks that his cause may be reheard; he makes the application to the department of the Government which has authority to give him that rehearing with a view of estimating the value of that which Congress has already recognized as being an obligation of the Government.

I vote for the bill upon the further incidental ground that a committee of this body has, after an intelligent and careful examination of the facts, assured the Senate that the facts now presented are such as give to this claimant an equitable and moral right to a rehearing, and that this equitable and moral right of the claimant can only be satisfied by the passage of the pending bill.

Having thus stated the reasons why I support this bill and the distinction which I think properly exists between this and the class of cases which have sometimes been presented to Congress and in some instances paid, and disavowing, as I do most distinctly, agreeing with the Senator from New Hampshire that I would pay for property under the circumstances which he describes, I do maintain that the pending bill is as equitable and just as if this had been a judicial inquiry for condemnation of private property to be taken for public uses.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CHANDLER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill. Is the demand seconded? [Putting the question.] The demand is not seconded.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am afraid the Chair did not notice that there was no quorum present. I ask that the roll may be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had not observed that. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the lack of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bate,	Faulkner,	Lodge,	Pasco,
Blackburn,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Peffer,
Caffery,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Platt,
Call,	Gray,	Manderson,	Power,
Carey,	Hale,	Martin,	Ransom,
Chandler,	Harris,	Mills,	Roach,
Cockrell,	Hill,	Mitchell, Oregon	Sherman,
Coke,	Hoar,	Mitchell, Wis.	Vilas,
Cullom,	Hunton,	Morrill,	Washburn,
Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Murphy,	White, La.
Dolph,	Kyle,	Palmer,	Wilson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill. Is the call seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is not present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], but I have now an understanding with him that I may vote to make a quorum, and I shall exercise that right on all matters which are not political, where my vote may be necessary to make a quorum.

My vote is now necessary to help make a quorum, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I inquire whether the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not yet voted.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think the Senator from Idaho may vote upon this question, notwithstanding his pair with my colleague.

Mr. DUBOIS. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN (when Mr. GIBSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote.

FRANCES CORSE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 63, being the bill (S. 882) granting a pension to Frances Corse, widow of Gen. John M. Corse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitation of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. Frances Corse, widow of late Bvt. Maj. Gen. John M. Corse, at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the bill been reported by the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say in behalf of the committee that the bill has been unanimously recommended by the committee and reported by myself, a somewhat lengthy printed report having been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report which accompanies the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER October 11, 1893, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. WALTHALL. I do not care to have the report read further.

Mr. HOAR. The report has been half read and will have to go into the RECORD. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that it all go in.

Mr. WALTHALL. I suppose it will be printed in the RECORD anyhow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the report go into the RECORD.

Mr. WALTHALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOAR. My suggestion was that, half the report having been read, the whole of it should be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALTHALL. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 882) granting a pension to Frances Corse, widow of Gen. John M. Corse, have given the matter careful consideration, and respectfully report:

Mrs. Corse is the widow of the late Bvt. Maj. Gen. John M. Corse, the "hero of Allatoona," who died at his home in Winchester, Mass., in April last. Gen. Corse was severely wounded at Allatoona, but he refused to leave the field, and his gallant defense of that post against heavy odds undoubtedly saved Sherman's army from great embarrassment and probable defeat, and made possible without delay the completion of the arrangements for the great "march to the sea."

Gen. Corse received in all five wounds, and was so injured in the limbs as to prevent him taking proper exercise. He suffered great pain at frequent intervals, and was often confined to his house and bed, to the great injury of his business activity. Notwithstanding this, Gen. Corse performed many public duties, and after four years' service as postmaster of Boston his reappointment was asked in 1890 by the leading business men of that city, without regard to party.

As bearing on the exceedingly valuable military services performed by Gen. Corse, your committee submit the following extracts from the memoirs of the late Gen. William T. Sherman:

"We crossed the Chattahoochee River during the 3d and 4th of October, rendezvoused at the old battlefield of Smyrna Camp, and the next day reached Marietta and Kenesaw. The telegraph wires had been cut above Marietta, and learning that heavy masses of infantry, artillery, and cavalry had been seen from Kenesaw (marching north), I inferred that Allatoona was their objective point, and on the 4th of October I signaled from Vinings Station to Kenesaw, and from Kenesaw to Allatoona, over the heads of the enemy, a message for Gen. Corse, at Rome, to hurry back to the assistance of the garrison at Allatoona. Allatoona was held by a small brigade, commanded by Lieut. Col. Tourtellotte, my present aid-de-camp. He had two small redoubts on either side of the railroad, overlooking the village of Allatoona and the warehouses, in which were stored over a million rations of bread.

"Reaching Kenesaw Mountain about 8 a. m. of October 5 (a beautiful day), I had a superb view of the vast panorama of the north and west. To the southwest, about Dallas, could be seen the smoke of camp fires, indicating the presence of a large force of the enemy, and the whole line of railroad from Big Shanty up to Allatoona (full 15 miles) was marked by the fires of the burning railroad. We could plainly see the smoke of battle about Allatoona and hear the faint reverberation of the cannon.

"From Kenesaw I ordered the Twenty-third Corps (Gen. Cox) to march due west on the Burnt Hickory Road and to burn houses or piles of brush as it progressed, to indicate the head of column, hoping to interpose this corps between Hood's main army at Dallas and the detachment then assailing Allatoona. The rest of the army was directed straight for Allatoona, northwest, distant 18 miles. The signal officer on Kenesaw reported that since daylight he had failed to obtain any answer to his call for Allatoona; but while I was with him he caught a faint glimpse of the tell-tale flag through an embrasure, and after much time he made out these letters: 'C.,' 'R.,' 'S.,' 'E.,' 'H.,' 'E.,' 'R.,' and translated the message: 'Corse is here.' It was a source of great relief, for it gave me the first assurance that Gen. Corse had received his orders and that the place was adequately garrisoned.

"I watched, with painful suspense, the indications of the battle raging there, and was dreadfully impatient at the slow progress of the relieving column, whose advance was marked by the smokes which were made according to orders; but about 2 p. m. I noticed with satisfaction that the smoke of battle about Allatoona grew less and less, and ceased altogether about 4 p. m. For a time I attributed this result to the effect of Gen. Cox's march, but later in the afternoon the signal flag announced the welcome tidings that the attack had been fairly repulsed, but that Gen. Corse was wounded. The next day my aid, Col. Dayton, received this characteristic dispatch:

"'ALLATOONA, GA., October 6, 1864—2 p. m.

"'Capt. L. M. DAYTON, Aid-de-Camp:

"'I am short a cheekbone and an ear, but am able to whip all h—l yet. My losses are very heavy. A force moving from Stilesboro to Kingston gives me some anxiety. Tell me where Sherman is.

"'JOHN M. CORSE,
"'Brigadier-General.'

"Inasmuch as the enemy had retreated southwest, and would probably next appear at Rome, I answered Gen. Corse with orders to get back to Rome with his troops as quickly as possible.

"Gen. Corse's report of this fight at Allatoona is very full and graphic. It is dated Rome, October 27, 1864; recites the fact that he received his orders by signal to go to the assistance of Allatoona on the 4th, when he telegraphed to Kingston for cars, and a train of thirty empty cars was started for him, but about ten of them got off the track and caused delay. By 7 p. m. he had at Rome a train of twenty cars, which he loaded up with Col. Rowett's brigade and part of the Twelfth Illinois Infantry; started at 8 p. m., reaching Allatoona (distant 35 miles) at 1 a. m. on the 5th, and sent the train back for more men; but the road was in bad order and no more men came in time. He found Col. Tourtellotte's garrison composed of 890 men; his reënforcement was 1,054; total for the defense, 1,944. The outposts were already engaged and as soon as daylight came he drew back the men from the village to the ridge on which the redoubts were built.

"The enemy was composed of French's division of three brigades, variously reported from four to five thousand strong. This force gradually surrounded the place by 8 a. m., when Gen. French sent in by flag of truce this note:

"'AROUND ALLATOONA, October 5, 1864.

"'COMMANDING OFFICER, UNITED STATES FORCES, Allatoona:

"'I have placed the forces under my command in such positions that you are surrounded, and to avoid a needless effusion of blood I call on you to surrender your forces at once and unconditionally.

"'Five minutes will be allowed you to decide. Should you accede to this, you will be treated in the most honorable manner as prisoners of war.

"'I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

"'S. G. FRENCH,

"'Major-General, Commanding Forces Confederate States.'

"Gen. Corse answered immediately:

"'HEADQUARTERS FOURTH DIVISION, FIFTEENTH CORPS,

"'Allatoona, Ga., October 5, 1864—8:30 a. m.

"'Maj. Gen. S. G. FRENCH,

"'Confederate States, etc.:

"'Your communication demanding surrender of my command I acknowledge receipt of, and respectfully reply that we are prepared for the 'needless effusion of blood' whenever it is agreeable to you.

"'I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"'JOHN M. CORSE,

"'Brigadier-General, Commanding Forces United States.'

"Of course the attack began at once, coming from front, flank, and rear. There were two small redoubts, with slight parapets and ditches, one on each side of the deep railroad cut. These redoubts had been located by Col. Poe, United States Engineer, at the time of our advance on Kenesaw the previous June. Each redoubt overlooked the storehouses close by the railroad and each could aid the other defensively by catching in flank the attacking force of the other. Our troops at first endeavored to hold some ground outside the redoubts, were soon driven inside, when the enemy made repeated assaults but were always driven back. About 11 a. m. Col. Redfield, of the Thirty-ninth Iowa, was killed, and Col. Rowett was wounded, but never ceased to fight and encourage his men. Col. Tourtellotte was shot through the hips, but continued to command. Gen. Corse was, at 1 p. m., shot across the face, the ball cutting his ear, which stunned him, but he continued to encourage his men and to give orders. The enemy (about 1:30 p. m.) made a last and desperate effort to carry one of the redoubts, but was badly cut to pieces by the artillery and infantry fire from the other, when he began to draw off, leaving his dead and wounded on the ground.

"Before finally withdrawing, Gen. French converged a heavy fire of his cannon on the blockhouse of Allatoona Creek, about 2 miles from the depot, set it on fire and captured its garrison, consisting of 4 officers and 85 men. By 4 p. m. he was in full retreat south on the Dallas road, and got by before the head of Gen. Cox's column had reached it; still several ambulances and stragglers were picked up by this command on that road. Gen. Corse reported 231 rebel dead, 411 prisoners, 3 regimental colors, and 800 muskets captured.

"Among the prisoners was a Brig. Gen. Young, who thought that French's aggregate loss would reach 2,000. Col. Tourtellotte says that for days after Gen. Corse had returned to Rome his men found and buried at least a hundred more dead rebels, who had, doubtless, been wounded and died in the woods near Allatoona. I know that when I reached Allatoona on the 9th I saw a good many dead men, which had been collected for burial.

"Corse's entire loss, officially reported, was:

Garrison.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Officers	6	23	6	35
Men	136	330	206	672
Total	142	353	212	707

"I esteemed this defense of Allatoona so handsome and important that I made it a subject of a general order, viz: No. 86, of October 7, 1864:

"'The general commanding avails himself of the opportunity in the handsome defense made of Allatoona to illustrate the most important principle in war, that fortified posts should be defended to the last, regardless of the relative numbers of the party attacking and attacked. * * * The thanks of this army are due and are hereby accorded to Gen. Corse, Col. Tourtellotte, Col. Rowett, officers, and men, for their determined and gallant defense of Allatoona, and it is made an example to illustrate the importance of preparing in time and meeting the danger, when present, boldly, manfully, and well.

"'Commanders and garrisons of the posts along our railroad are hereby instructed that they must hold their posts to the last minute, sure that the time gained is valuable and necessary to their comrades at the front.

"'By order of Maj. Gen. W. T. Sherman:

"'L. M. DAYTON,

"'Aid-de-Camp.'"

Gen. Corse never applied for a pension, and refused to patiently listen to the suggestion that he ask for one. He would have been entitled to a high rate of pension from the close of the war to the time of his death, and would probably have drawn from the Treasury more money than the Government will ever be called upon to pay under the pending bill. The widow was not willing at first to have the question of a pension for herself considered, but eventually consented to have her friends present the matter, especially on behalf of her boy of 9 years. It is with the purpose of giving him a proper education as the son of a brave man who "held the fort" at Allatoona, greatly contributing to the success of Sherman's march to the sea, that she is willing to accept the grateful recognition of Congress.

Gen. Corse's wounds and other physical disabilities prevented him from giving proper attention to business after his retirement from the postmastership of Boston. He died very poor, his estate having inventoried, as your committee is informed, only $60.

There are numerous precedents for this pension, and your committee is earnestly of the opinion that the bill should be enacted into law without amendment, and accordingly recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. AND JOSEPH M. CORNELL.

Mr. DOLPH. I have some little bills, which will be reached in a moment when we go to the Calendar regularly, and, as there is no objection to them, I wish that we might now go to the Calendar of unobjected cases.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator from Texas will let me have a bill or two considered and passed. If the Senator will withdraw his motion, I will ask unanimous consent to take up a bill.

Mr. COKE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Texas to withdraw his motion.

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 73.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report which accompanies the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, September 4, 1893, but before concluding was interrupted by——

Mr. DOLPH. Is it necessary to read the letters which accompany the report? It is merely a case of money wrongfully required to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to dispensing with the further reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the further reading of the report will be dispensed with.

Mr. HOAR. The report, at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], was partially read. It all ought to go into the RECORD, or it all ought to go out of the RECORD.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no obection. Let the entire report be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will be printed in the RECORD in full.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill S. 73, have examined the same and recommend that the bill be passed.

The committee adopt the report of the committee upon a similar bill at the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1149, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3649) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell, have examined the same, and report that the bill be passed as amended.

William J. Cornell was required by the register of the land office at La Grande, Oregon, to pay $2.50 per acre on land entry numbered 4298, for the south half of section 27, township 3 north, of range 30 east; and Joseph M. Cornell was required to pay $2.50 per acre on land entry numbered 4292, for the north half of section 27, township 3 north, range 30 east, when the legal price of the same was $1.25 per acre, as will appear by letters of the Commissioner of the General Land Office hereto attached and made a part hereof.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office holds that the overpayments can not be refunded under existing laws.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1892.

SIR: In reference to the matter of the application of William J. Cornell for return of $1.25 per acre on cash entry Lagrande, Oregon, No. 4292, for the S. ½ sec. 27, T. 3 N., R. 30 E., which was denied by my predecessor in letter to the register and receiver at Lagrande, of October 1, 1891, being the subject of your late inquiry, I have the honor to state that the case in question appears to be governed by the principles of the decision of the Secretary of the Interior in the case of Joseph Brown (5 L. D., 317), which holds that the Department is not clothed with power to make repayments except by specific statutory authorization.

The existing legislation providing for repayments in cases where parties have paid double minimum prices for land which has been found not to be within the limits of a railroad land grant, viz, the act of June 16, 1880, 21 Stats., 287, does not apply so as to cover a case of this kind in which the land is actually within the limits of a railroad land grant. I can not, therefore, do otherwise than adhere to the conclusion of my predecessor above mentioned.

The copy of his letter of October 1, 1891, is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

W. M. STONE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1892.

SIR: In answer to your verbal inquiry of this date, in the matter of the claim of William J. Cornell and Joseph Cornell, respectively, for repayment of $1.25 per acre, paid on certain entries made at Lagrande, Oregon, I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter addressed to the register and receiver, Lagrande, relative to the case of William J. Carnell, dated October 1, 1891. A similar letter was written on October 3, 1891, in the case of Joseph Carnell.

Very respectfully,

M. M. ROSE,
Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 1, 1891.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your letter of 14th ultimo, transmitting application of William J. Cornell for return of $1.25 per acre on cash entry No. 4222, for the S. ½ sec. 27, T. 3 N., R. 30 E., you are advised that said entry was made under the third section of the act of September 29, 1890, and the party should have only been required to pay $1.25 per acre. But the party paid $2.50 per acre, making a total of $960, under the impression of your office that the land was double minimum in price.

This land was within the granted limits of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad, from Wallula to Tacoma, which road has been constructed. By the act of September 29, 1890, the land within the granted limits of the unconstructed portion of the Northern Pacific Railroad was forfeited to the United States.

As the Cascade Branch has been constructed, the railroad company took as a moiety the alternate odd sections from 1 to 5, etc., but the vacant lands within the limits of said branch were only subject to entry at the price of $2.50 per acre, except to parties coming under the third section of said act, and the party should have entered the land at $1.25 per acre.

The amount overpaid on said entry can not be refunded under the act of June 16, 1880, as said act provided, "In all cases where parties have paid double minimum price for land which has been found not to be within the limits of a railroad land grant, the excess of $1.25 per acre shall in like manner be repaid to the purchaser thereof, or to his heirs or assigns." In the case now under consideration, although the railroad grant has been forfeited to the United States, said road has been constructed, but the lands have never been restored to the minimum price, and the vacant lands formerly within the limits of the branch lines are only subject to entry at $2.50 per acre, except as is specifically provided in certain cases under said act.

This is a case of an erroneous exaction of $1.25 per acre on the part of the local land officers, but, under the law, this office could not afford the party any relief. The application is denied.

Very respectfully,

THOS. H. CARTER, Commissioner.

REGISTER AND RECEIVER,
Lagrande, Oregon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 288) to provide two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 88) providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

THOMAS GUINEAN.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 75, which is a bill of similar character to the one just passed. The bill was reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. It has several times passed the Senate, but failed in the House of Representatives.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 75) for the relief of Thomas Guinean. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas Guinean, of Oregon, the assignee of Bradley S. Hoyt, deceased, of California, $160, paid the United States on account of land entry at Shasta, Cal., and which entry was subsequently canceled.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there no provision of law for repayment where an entry is canceled?

Mr. DOLPH. The Department say not. A bill similar to this has two or three times passed the Senate,

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that; but the single question with me is whether there is not a general law which would authorize the repayment of money where an entry has been canceled?

Mr. DOLPH. Not in this case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the Committee on Public Lands ought to report such a bill.

Mr. DOLPH. This action has been recommended by the committee, and a similar bill has passed the Senate a number of times.

Mr. PALMER. What is there peculiar in this case to except it from the operation of the general law?

Mr. DOLPH. It is a case where land was entered as desert land, and when the authorities came to pass upon it they held that it ought not to be classed as desert land, and canceled the entry; but the money had gone into the Treasury, and it can not be got out of the Treasury without an appropriation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see that there is any report in the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No report accompanies the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. This was a desert-land entry?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it canceled because of noncompliance with the law?

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir; but because the Department held, according to the evidence they had, that the land ought not to be entered as desert land, but ought to be classed as agricultural land, and so have refused to refund the money.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it were desert land——

Mr. DOLPH. No, it is not that. The matter has been examined by the Committee on Public Lands, and I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] or some Senator on the other side of the Chamber examined it.

Mr. WALTHALL. The pending bill was examined by the chairman of the committee [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. DOLPH. The chairman of the committee reported the present bill, but I was speaking of a previous bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. I remember something of the bill, and I think it was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. DOLPH. It has been unanimously reported every time it has been before the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 288) to provide two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WALTHALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 11, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 7, 1893.

Washington Hesing, to be postmaster at Chicago, in the County of Cook and State of Illinois, in the place of James A. Sexton, resigned.

Benjamin F. Moberley, to be postmaster at Windsor, in the county of Shelby and State of Illinois, in the place of Charles Voris, removed.

John F. Fulton, to be postmaster at Huntington, in the county of Huntington and State of Indiana, in the place of James M. Rogers, removed.

Charles H. Leach, to be postmaster at Kokomo, in the county of Howard and State of Indiana, in the place of George W. McKinsey, resigned.

The SPEAKER. This will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the title of the communication with reference to the artillery school at Fortress Monroe. Should not that go to the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title again.

The Clerk again reported the title.

The SPEAKER. This will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, ought not that to go to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed that it had in previous years been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. The inclination of the Chair would be to send it to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Chair will refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs. The accompanying documents will not be printed unless the committee desire it, as they are quite voluminous.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Very well; let it be so ordered.

E. L. CURRIER AND GEORGE JENISON.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a report from the Committee on Accounts, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint E. L. Currier and George Jenison as special messengers, to be employed generally in and about the business of the House, during the Fifty-third Congress, commencing with the first regular session of said Congress, and who shall be paid a salary of $100 per month out of the contingent fund of the House until other provision shall be made for such payment by order of the House or of Congress."

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, having duly considered the same, recommend its passage, inasmuch as it makes no increase in the present force of the House, and it has been the custom of previous Houses to give recognition to the minority of the House on the Doorkeeper's roll.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYÉS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I have another report from the Committee on Accounts for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and three laborers at $720 per annum each; that the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ eight folders at $900 per annum each, and four folders, during the session, at $75 per month each; that the Postmaster of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ three messengers at $1,200 per annum each, and two messengers during the session at $100 per month each; and that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay the above employés out of the contingent fund of the House until they are otherwise provided for.

Resolved, further, That the board of Capitol police be authorized to employ six additional policemen at a salary of $1,100 per annum each, and four additional watchmen at a salary of $900 per annum each, one-half of which salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for; Provided, That the Senate agrees to pay the other half of the expenses of the additional policemen or watchmen.

Mr. RUSK. The committee recommend a substitute for that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, having considered the accompanying resolution, offer the following in lieu thereof, and recommend the passage of the same:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ one clerk at $1,200 per annum, to be assigned to the disbursing department of the Clerk's office, and two laborers at $720 per annum each; that the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ eight folders during the session, and one month thereafter, at $75 per month each; that the Postmaster of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ one messenger at $100 per month and one laborer at $75 per month during the sessions of the Fifty-third Congress; and that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay the above employés out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for a few moments in connection with this report. It will be observed that there is a marked difference between the substitute of the committee and the original resolution. The original resolution was offered at the suggestion of the officers of the House, who thought the increase of force set forth in the resolution was necessary in their respective departments to bring the offices up to a proper standard of efficiency. The committee investigated the matter very carefully, and the pending substitute which they recommend for adoption is the result of that inquiry.

They find in the Clerk's office that the force is inadequate as far as the disbursing department is concerned, the clerks being required frequently to work at nights and on Sundays to keep up the business of the office. This has been especially the case since the provision went into effect authorizing the employment of clerks by members.

The Clerk of the House has eighteen or nineteen rooms under his control and has no force whatever for the janitor's work. The clerks of the House have heretofore contributed themselves to have this work done; and it was thought proper, in view of the circumstances, to allow two laborers to be provided for that service.

So far as the office of the Postmaster is concerned, after an investigation made by an inspector from the General Post-Office Department and in accordance with his recommendation, it is determined to allow the office two extra men, one to be assigned at the city post-office to prevent what has frequently occurred heretofore, the blocking of mail matter there, and one extra man on the wagons. The original resolution asked for five. The committee determined after their investigation to recommend the employment of two, believing the others can be dispensed with.

In the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms there was a request for an increase of six in the Capitol police force and four watchmen. The committee determined in view of the examination made to make no increase in that direction.

So far as the Doorkeeper's department is concerned, it has been usual during the second or third month of each regular session to increase the force by twelve or fourteen men to do the work of the folding room. The Doorkeeper, however, preferred the assignment of a less number if they were given to him at an earlier stage in the session; and we have, therefore, recommended the employment of eight during the session and for one month thereafter. The Doorkeeper of the present Congress finds himself unusually burdened with work by reason of the extra session, having upwards of one million of speeches to fold ready for shipment, and there are other documents in large numbers to be handled. As I have said, he prefers to have a smaller number of men assigned at once, and the committee, therefore, recommend the employment of eight. In point of expenditure the salary of the eight will amount to no more than the salary for the larger number if employed at the usual time.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RUSK. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand from the reading of the resolution that it provides for an additional clerk in the office of the Clerk?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that under recent regulations—the regulation providing for the printing of the enrolled bills—that under that provision we are able to dispense with three or four clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House. It occurs to me, therefore, that it will be unnecessary to increase the force in the Clerk's office at this time. There is no longer any necessity for these enrolling clerks. I know something about this matter, having been on the committee, and I would like to have the gentleman explain why it is considered necessary to have an increased force when the work has been greatly reduced recently.

Besides, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that it looks to me as if we were going along rather recklessly, considering that the Government is "broke"—ready to go into bankruptcy as soon as the bankrupt bill gets through! [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSK. In response to the gentleman, I will state that the Clerk of the House was before our committee on several occasions, and insisted that it was absolutely necessary to have an extra man in the disbursing office in order to keep up the accounts.

Mr. SAYERS. When the Clerk of the House was before the committee, was it not prior to the passage of the joint resolution authorizing the printing of engrossed and enrolled bills?

Mr. RUSK. Probably it was.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw that portion of the resolution referring to this extra clerk until the matter can be inquired into more thoroughly.

Mr. RUSK. Let the gentleman move to strike out that clause.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; in order that the Committee on Accounts may have an opportunity to inquire into the necessity of an additional clerk in the Clerk's office, in view of the passage of the joint resolution for the printing of engrossed and enrolled bills, I move to strike out so much of the resolution as provides for an additional clerk in the Clerk's office.

Mr. RUSK. That amendment is acceptable to me.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "one clerk at $1,200 per annum, to be assigned to the disbursing department of the Clerk's office, and."

Mr. KILGORE. Now, if some one will move to strike out the balance it will be all right. [Laughter.]

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RUSK] will allow me a moment, I would like to say——

Mr. RUSK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman whether the force of this House is not now larger without this increase than it ever has been?

Mr. RUSK. No, sir; the force of the House at present is the same as at the last session, less the extra folders who were then employed. Counting those extra folders, the force of the last House was larger than that of the present House. We are now providing for eight of these folders as against fourteen provided for in the last House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Do you not make an increase in the post-office and Clerk's office?

Mr. RUSK. We allow two additional men, one at the city post-office and one on the wagons; and this has been done in furtherance of the report of an inspector from the Department, who considered these men absolutely necessary in order to prevent a blocking of the mails at the city post-office.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not prepared, even if I had the power, to antagonize the gentleman's proposition in regard to the force of the House, but I do wish to say that I believe an intelligent and thorough overhauling of the whole force of the House and the Senate would enable both these bodies to be served with probably one-half to two-thirds of the present force.

I feel I ought to say that; I do not apprehend it will do any good after I have said it. Still I had hoped that in this era of "reform," with our Democratic friends in complete possession of the Government and with a President who calls attention to the fact that there is a deficit in the Treasury, and that we have at last reached that point so long hoped and prayed for when there could be reform all along the line—I had hoped that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RUSK] and my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and in fact the Democracy generally, would make that reform—and would begin right here in our midst where, it seems to me, it is quite as badly needed as elsewhere.

Mr. RUSK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will give me his attention.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me quite strange that the gentleman from Illinois during the Fifty-first Congress, when he had control of this matter, should not have reformed and reduced this force to one-half, as he thinks might be done now. I am disposed, however, to concur with the gentleman that there ought to be a thorough reorganization of the force both of the Senate and the House; I believe that a reduction could be effected, and that after such reduction the work would be more efficiently done. But I hope the gentleman before he begins to criticise this side of the House will recall the administration of his own party in the Fifty-first Congress and will explain to the House why he and his political associates did not then do what he complains of the Democrats for not doing now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If my friend will allow me——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the Reporter will add "the gentleman from Illinois smilingly said, thus and so," it will make this debate more easily understood.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, what else could I do but so smile, in the presence of 100 majority on that side of the House. And I will say to my friend, when he refers to the reform that is being made upon what was done in the Fifty-first Congress, we had a bare majority——

Mr. DOCKERY. Which was rapidly increased.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And we did accomplish a great deal by beneficent legislation, as I think; but we were the "wicked Republicans," so long in power, that you have at last overthrown; and now it seems to me that it is time that you bring forth some fruits along with your profession; and I wanted to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance.

Mr. SAYERS. I will remind the gentleman that his small majority was very rapidly increased. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman will permit me to say that he had an opportune occasion, when we put two Republicans on the roll a minute ago, to make these comments.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to state, to correct the impression that we are making a great increase in the force of the House, that the committee declined to act on the resolution which was referred to it, or report it favorably, which did make a marked increase, and that we only reported in favor of making an increase that we deemed absolutely necessary to properly perform the duties the House has imposed on the various officers of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman in charge of the measure state to the House the increase, both as to number and amount, carried by this proposition over the force of the Fifty-second Congress?

Mr. RUSK. In the Clerk's office we allow three messengers at $720 each; in the post-office there is an increase of one messenger at $1,200 and another at $900. In the Doorkeeper's office, instead of allowing fourteen men during three or four months of the session, for the remainder of the session, we have allowed eight men from the beginning of the session. The amount in full will probably be less than the fourteen men usually borne on the roll for a few months.

Mr. MORSE. How about the laborers employed about the Capitol?

Mr. RUSK. We have allowed three laborers in the Clerk's office.

Mr. MORSE. Has not the increase of the force been necessitated by the increase of the membership of the House?

Mr. RUSK. The increase of membership, of course, always tends to create a necessity for an increase in the force to do the work. We have been as careful as possible, and have only allowed men who are absolutely necessary. The total number is two in the post-office, two in the Clerk's office, and eight under the Doorkeeper, as against fourteen for the latter part of the session.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the net increase in numbers?

Mr. RUSK. It would not be a net increase, but a decrease.

We appoint twelve men instead of fourteen which are usually allowed to the Doorkeeper at a later period of the session, and this session there is a special necessity for it, because all the work of the extra session is now in the hands of the Doorkeeper. Formerly there has been no necessity for such an increase until the second or third month of the regular session, because Congress would not get to work until January.

Mr. DOCKERY. Can the gentleman state the total number of the employés of the House during the Fifty-second Congress?

Mr. RUSK. I can not state the total number. We propose the appointment of twelve people in all. I ask the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the standing committees for reports.

The committees were called.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 88), providing for the payment of salaries and expenses of additional deputy collectors of internal revenue to carry out the provisions of the Chinese exclusion act of May 5, 1892, as amended by the act of November 3, 1893; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3544) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 42), permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

SAN PEDRO HARBOR, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CANNON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to this House at the earliest practical moment the greatest depth of water that it is feasible to obtain in the inner harbor at San Pedro, on the coast of Los Angeles County, Cal., and the probable cost thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. I think it should go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The morning hour begins at half past 12, and the call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs, who have a resolution before the House.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution, which will be read by the Clerk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there are constantly before Congress numerous bills dealing with the question of rank and pay in the Navy, and other matters concerning the personnel of the same; and

Whereas the present laws relating to this subject are in many instances imperfect, inconsistent, unjust, and the result of piecemeal legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed respectively by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to fully investigate and consider the entire subject of the rank, pay, and all other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy; to have power to send for persons and papers, sit during the recess, if any, and during the sitting of both Houses, and to report at any time after it convenes as may be convenient what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises; any bill so reported by them shall simplify, codify, and revise existing laws relating to the personnel of the Navy so far as may be found possible.

The CHAIRMAN. When this concurrent resolution was last under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the committee had divided upon a motion made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] to report to the House the resolution as amended, with the recommendation that it do pass. Upon that division no quorum voted, and, pending the division, the morning hour expired. The resolution, therefore, comes over for action at this time, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, if there be no objection, I ask unanimous consent that before the count by tellers is resumed the report upon the concurrent resolution be read.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. MEYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to investigate and consider the subject of the rank, pay, and other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy, have the honor to make the following report:

The importance of the subject has been continuously recognized by the Navy Department and by preceding Congresses, and has remained unacted upon, except in special instances and by piecemeal only, for want of time and proper concert of action. With the growth of the material of the Navy, the necessity of reorganization is becoming yearly more pressing. Inasmuch as it is impossible to deal adequately with the subject by reference to one branch of the service, or with regard to especial cases, it is deemed that a joint committee, empowered to investigate fully and thoroughly and as a whole, can most satisfactorily ascertain the best method to remedy the difficulties of the situation.

Various measures have been proposed for the reorganization of the service, or a part of it. These can all be thus considered in special relation to each other; and by this means Congressional action will rest upon a broad basis of the requirements of the whole Navy, instead of fragmentary reforms affecting only particular branches of the service.

Much conflict of opinion exists as to the organization and status of the staff of the Navy, which should receive further legislative action. This is more especially the case with the Engineer Corps, some maintaining that the present authorized force is greater than needed; others that the number is inadequate and that an enlargement is necessary. The contention being, in the first instance, that skilled and trained engineers are needed mainly for the purposes of construction and scientific work on shore, and that a separate corps of sea-going engineers, drawn from the most competent members of the machinist grade, would prove sufficiently efficient, under the general supervision of the line officers. The great ocean steamers, such as the Paris, the Campania, and others, are handled most successfully and at the highest speed, not by the scientific, but by men who have been trained as, and who have the practical skill of, machinist. England, whose actions and systems are based upon the most careful investigation and are the result of the most practical tests, is gradually, it is claimed, coming to the plan of relying upon machinists for engine-room duty on her war ships; and it is now proposed to give them rank of warrant officers as a reward, and to inspire them with a higher sense of their responsibilities for their important duties.

On the other hand, it is claimed that scientific engineers and no others are competent to run modern engines. It is advanced, with much force, that a modern man-of-war is a vast and complex machine, needing intelligent and trained minds to insure a perfect working of all the parts, failure in any one of which may be fatal at a vital moment; and the sense of responsibility, the physical and nervous strain upon the engineer-officer charged with the care and supervision of this network of machinery is very great; his duties are not only of the highest importance, for upon him depends the efficiency of the motive power, but they are at the same time arduous and dangerous. Manual labor and subordinates are at his service, but he can not be everywhere, and he should have the assistance of men like himself, and commissioned like himself, to share his responsibilities. Our new vessels embrace all that is most advanced in high-class machinery. There are a multitude of engines and devices by means of which steam, electrical, and mechanical appliances are made to do the work of man; under this view, it would seem, then, to be a false economy to provide an insufficient number of officers to control them, and hazardous to rely upon any but men of the highest and most thorough training.

In reference to the line officers the argument in favor of measures for a change is strong, and must convince any impartial body that a radical modification of existing laws must be made to prevent the personnel of the Navy from becoming totally inefficient from congestion and paralysis; and a correct apprehension of the serious character of the existing evils, of their inevitable effect, must be followed by the admission that some immediate remedy is needed.

The causes of the present stagnation in promotion and efficiency are deemed as follows:

1. Owing to an excessive and enormous number of appointments as midshipmen in 1841, very few were made from that year to 1846, and these few have wholly disappeared. The survivors of 1841 date have very recently retired, and a cessation of retirements has followed, corresponding to the original cessation in appointing. This block to promotion has about disappeared; analogous to this cause of difficulty and operating in the same way, is the fact that the number of officers now remaining on the active list from those who entered between 1846 and 1859 is, owing to the civil war, considerably less than would normally survive. In consequence of this the annual retirements from the head of the list are now, and must for some years continue to be, below normal, and promotions correspondingly fewer.

2. By the act of August, 1882, a reduction of twenty-nine was made in the number of rear-admirals, commodores, captains, and commanders. This put a stop to promotion in taking away so many possible vacancies; and these being at the head of the list, the effect was felt through every grade. An immediate and absolute stoppage was avoided by a provision of the act allowing one promotion for every two vacancies; but the actual loss of promotion still exists, though the effect was distributed over several years. The grade of lieutenant-commander was reduced by six at the same time, with a similar effect upon all below it. The grades remaining smaller, the waste from them is less, and the yearly promotions consequently fewer; and, as the number now allowed in flag rank bear less than their proper proportion to the whole Navy, and are not adequate to the requirements of the service, the rate of promotion, under existing conditions, will, from this cause alone, continue smaller than it should be.

3. The most serious cause for stagnation and one affecting a part of the service to which the country must, in a very few years hence, look for its leading naval officers is this:

During the eight years preceding 1860, from 1852 to 1859, both inclusive, the number graduated from the Naval Academy was less than the annual waste. During this period occurred also the scrutiny of the list in 1855, in consequence of which a large number of officers were removed from the active list and their places filled from the passed midshipmen of the Navy. The effect of this was to reduce the number of officers, below the grade of lieutenant, from 258 in 1854 to 78 in 1857; rising in 1861 to no more than 91, among whom are included all graduated midshipmen. Under this state of things the war came, bringing a great number of resignations from all grades of the Navy, creating at once a large number of vacancies in the grades from lieutenant upward, to fill which from the usual and proper sources of supply there existed only the meager provisions of 91 junior officers. The great necessary expansion to the fleet increased the embarrassment of the Department for officers, and particularly for watch and division officers, to meet the emergency. The comparatively simple character of the armaments of that day, and the fact that the enemy had no Navy with which to assume an active attitude, enabled the Government to supply its wants in a fairly satisfactory manner from the merchant marine; but, without in the least detracting from the zeal and maritime experience of the officers who flocked from the latter into the Navy, it was perfectly plain that such a lack of young men, trained to military habits and drill, would have been utterly disastrous had our ships been called upon to confront a regular service.

To the experience of actual want for watch officers is to be attributed the natural but most inconsiderate policy which prevailed from 1860 to 1867, inclusive, and to which the most serious features of the present distress are attributable, the numbers under instruction at the Naval Academy were kept at the highest possible limit, and the cadets pressed through to graduation with the utmost rapidity—the classes even being divided, according to the apparent ability of certain members to be pushed through in a shorter time than the average. On the 1st of January, 1865, when the war was about to close, there were 455 midshipmen in the Academy, of whom, and 31 others already graduated, a total of 486 had entered since the war began. In January, 1866, there were in the Academy 450, of whom 147 were in the lowest class. In that year 73 graduates entered the Navy. In January, 1867, the number at the Academy was 421, and in June there graduated 84. In June, 1868, graduated 78.

It should have been evident as a matter at the most of simple calculation, that the service could not, under any ordinary conditions of waste, absorb such large numbers and give them proper promotion. In 1862, the necessities of the war, and in 1866 a necessary reorganization, had each contributed to increase the numbers, and consequently the openings for promotion to graduates. The head man of the 78 who graduated in 1868 became a lieutenant in 1872, as did 15 others of his class, at an average age of 24. In 1893 they are still lieutenants at an age of 45. At the same time that this mass of graduates, so disproportionate to the probable openings of the future, were rushed into the Navy, the dates of 1860 and 1861, falling within the congested period, were further increased by the admission of a number of officers from the volunteer navy, whose services and proved ability were considered deserving of such recognition on the part of the Government.

Too few officers in one part of the list and too many in another, both operate to check promotion from below. The facts point to the same conclusion, viz: that in a healthily constituted service the rate of diminution in numbers from year to year should approximate to the rates calculated by actuary's rules.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

The condition of the Navy but ten years hence, if the present system continues, may be illustrated by the following:

1. Of those who entered the service prior to 1860 there are now 18 who will not have retired from age by the end of 1903. Calculation based upon statistics, made according to actuaries' rules, show that this number will be reduced in ten years to 12. These 12 will be the 6 rear-admirals and 6 of the commodores. Of the 295 now remaining who entered in 1860 to 1867, inclusive, 22 will retire from age, leaving 273. The latter number will, by casualties other than retirements from age, be reduced to not less than 180. This is also reached by calculation based upon statistics and made according to actuaries' rules. The senior of these 180, who will be at the head of the date of 1860, will be the seventh commodore; and the junior, who will be at the foot of the date of 1867, will be the forty-fifth lieutenant-commander. The latter officer will have been in the service thirty-five years, and if entered at the age of 16 will be 51 years old.*

If the rate of advancement at this point of the list be placed at 10 per year (and this is a large allowance), this officer will reach the grade of commander 39½ years after date of entry, and at the age of 55½ years. He will have 6½ years more of active service, during which he will pass through the grades of commander, captain, commodore, and rear-admiral.

2. Seventy-seven commanders, all the lieutenant-commanders (74), and 22 lieutenants, entered the service within a period of three years. Twenty-five years ago the senior of these commanders was at the head of the list of lieutenants (that is 2 numbers higher than the junior of these lieutenants now is.)

3. Part of the date of 1861, the date of 1862, and a part of the date of 1863, that is, practically, 2 classes, fill the entire grade of the lieutenant-commanders through which it has taken the senior 10½ years to pass.

4. The twentieth and eighty-fourth commanders are one year apart in date of entry. The difference between the dates of their commissions as commanders is twelve years and six months.

5. The head of the date of 1861, is a commander of seven years' standing; the foot of the same date is No. 10, on the list of lieutenant-commanders. If the latter be promoted in one year there will be eight years difference in the dates of commissions of two officers having the same length of service.

Many similar illustrations might be cited, but this is deemed sufficient.

In considering the effects upon the Navy of the existing conditions of the lists, which are partially illustrated by the examples just cited, the committee wishes to give prominence to the evident truth that the great aim of every system of naval promotion should be to produce thoroughly efficient commanding officers. The gathering of all the powers of a military command within the hull of a single moving body, making them wholly dependent for their exertions upon its movements, invests with singular importance the functions of the officer to whom those movements are intrusted; and the ability of any subordinate to use successfully the particular weapons committed to his charge rests ultimately upon the manner in which the captain handles the ship, and the position in which he puts her.

It is also historically established that from the conditions of sea warfare the control of an admiral over the individual vessels of his fleet has been, in battle, less than the control of a general over the divisions of his army. This is due to many conditions, but chiefly to the necessity of immediate action in naval battles, which does not allow time for the transmission of particular orders in an emergency. This condition, which has always obtained, is much enhanced by the greater power of movement possessed by modern vessels, and it can safely be affirmed that, while very much will depend upon the first tactical combinations of an admiral, the combat will mainly be determined by the power of initiation upon the part of captains to meet those emergencies of combat which the admiral can not possibly foresee.

So much depends upon the captain's skill, and that skill is made up of many factors, the presence of some of which, it must be confessed, can not always be affirmed before tested in battle. The highest order of fearlessness, readiness, and presence of mind are only revealed by trial. But one factor, and that of the greatest importance to the average man, can be known and assured, and that is practice—the habit of commanding and directing the movements of a ship. Granting average original aptitude, and upon such an average only can general dispositions be based, the subsequent ability to command will depend almost wholly upon the opportunity for commanding. This implies, of course, a sufficient length of time in command rank, and recognizes implicitly the aptitude of youth to acquire habit, and the growing indisposition of advancing years to rise to tasks and responsibilities unknown to its earlier age. This implicit recognition should receive explicit avowal by prescribing a minimum age at which command rank should be reached, as well as by providing a proportion of vessels adequate to impose constant practice of sea service and drill upon officers in command rank.

Unquestionably much might be accomplished in the direction of giving command at an early age, and so insuring the necessary habit by a system of purely personal selection, similar to that employed habitually in private business life; but independently of the difficulty of recognizing, in time of peace, the best men for war, it is not possible to supply in governmental selection (unless in war) that pressure of immediate personal interest in the efficiency of the person selected, which, in other pursuits, corrects the tendency of favoritism. This is especially true in our country, where the infrequency of war places military interests at a discount, and, even in military affairs, tends to allow political influence to preponderate over military. It is certain that the apprehension of this predominance mainly accounts for the repugnance heretofore manifested in the Navy to promotion by selection.

Nevertheless, selection of some sort and by some rule must be applied if command rank is to be reached at an age when responsibility can be assumed and readily formed, and the habit of command readily formed and efficiently acquired. A selection by age is already operative in almost every naval service. In our own, for over twenty-five years back, the retirement of officers at 62 has been a practical selection against them and in favor of their juniors.

Under some form of qualifications a selection by age or by length of service based upon average ages seems to be the means best suited to obtain the great desideratum, the one thing absolutely essential to an efficient service, viz, command at a specified minimum age, assuring a career as captains and admirals of an average sufficient length of time to give a well-formed habit of command and practice in handling ships among the officers of those grades. Unless selection in some form is practiced, it necessarily follows, from the promotion of officers under command rank to those holding it, that, with the best distribution of numbers among the grades, promotion by seniority alone will gradually advance the age at which command is reached, until a condition of block will recur similar to that now existent. The latter is simply an enormous exaggeration, a caricature, of the evils resulting from promotion by seniority alone.

The effects upon junior officers, junior, that is, in rank up to the verge of late middle life, can scarcely be understood by those unfamiliar with the service and the recognized theory of a captain's responsibility. The theory is that the captain is always on duty and at all times responsible; whatever is done by another is, so far as responsibility goes, done by him. This theory, which is apparently inseparable from the unity essential to all military command, works in two ways. The captain shrinks from permitting to others, his juniors, the charge of movements. If harm results he will be responsible to the Department. The junior shrinks from assuming any responsibility without the express permission, which the captain is unwilling to give. Thus is unconsciously but inevitably formed on the part of the junior a habit of constant reference, in cases of even slight difficulty, to the judgment of another, and of constant disregard of his own judgment. Upon promotion to command rank the change of position is violent, but the old habit remains; and if the change takes place late in life the habit will not be thrown off with the ease of earlier years, if at all. If it remain in the common form of self-distrust, lack of confidence in one's own judgment, it constitutes a very serious defect in that efficiency of the commanding officers, to produce which has been asserted to be, as it undoubtedly is, the great aim of any system of promotion.

"I consider it a great advantage," wrote the late Admiral Farragut, "to obtain command young; having observed as a general thing that persons who come into authority late in life shrink from responsibility, and often break down under its weight." (Life of Admiral Farragut, page 81.)

By the conditions thus shown the United States Navy has reached a state of things which during the next twenty years must exist in a most aggravated form. Nor is this all, for the officers who thus reach command and flag rank at a very advanced age will also have so short a period to remain in them they will neither have time to change their habit, nor the inducement to do so, arising from a reasonable length of active career before them.

It is, therefore, now high time to seek and apply a remedy. If much longer delayed the efficiency of our Navy will assuredly be jeopardized.

ENLISTED MEN OF THE NAVY.

Much can be and should be done to improve the status of the enlisted men of the Navy. Under the present method and system the service offers but few if any rewards for them. They are its bone and sinew, and yet the opportunities for advancement are more difficult than exist under many of the monarchical governments of the Old World. However high may be his qualifications, however great his zeal and worth, even though he may possess and have acquired all the attributes essential for an officer's duties, a commission is denied him. A petty officer's badge, or at the most the warrant of a gunner, is the extreme limit of his preferment.

The American youth of spirit, proud of his country and its free institutions, finds no allurement in a service which thus bars to him its glittering and highest prizes. Promotions from the ranks are quite frequent in the Army, and these opportunities have undoubtedly attracted a better element into its ranks. Why should we not, in democratic America, apply a similar system to the Navy?

Now, our vessels are manned mainly by foreign seamen. Our American boys of stamina and spirit will not enlist unless they see some hope, some encouragement that an officer's commission is not beyond the reach of the meritorious seaman.

MEASURES OF ENCOURAGEMENT TO REMAIN IN THE NAVY.

Some system of retirement after long and continuous service would make it more attractive, and by some such action a remedy may be found for the present necessary employment of foreigners and aliens to man our warships. The Navy of our country should be manned by its loyal and patriotic youth, representing its best progressive manhood, a bulwark of strength and moral force, such as contributed to its glory and success in its earlier history, and which gave to its ranks a John Paul Jones, and a Bainbridge, a Hull, and a Preble.

Your committee recommend the passage of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration a concurrent resolution of the House providing for a joint committee to investigate the personnel of the Navy, had found itself without a quorum, whereupon the Chairman had directed the roll to be called, and now reported to the House the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The roll call showing the presence of a quorum, the committee under the rule will resume its session.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, as it is within three minutes of the time, I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be considered as having expired.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WOLVERTON, for this day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LIVINGSTON, for this day, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill known as the bankruptcy bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire how much time remains on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has an hour and a half; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] an hour and forty-three minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I had agreed to divide the time remaining to me into three parts; but the gentlemen with whom I had made the division have declined to take the part allotted to them, and insisting that it shall all be consumed in a single speech against the pending bill, they have very kindly devolved it upon me to close the discussion for our side.

In almost every community in this land to-day there are men hopelessly involved in debt—so hopelessly, indeed, that their creditors indulge no reasonable expectation of receiving any payment; and the unfortunate debtors themselves, realizing how impossible it is to pay everything, are making no effort to pay anything. Many of these men are energetic, intelligent, and honest; but under this enfeebling paralysis of debt their energy, their intelligence, and their integrity, are lost as factors in the progress and development of their country. Each year increases their number and their despondency, and appeals to us more strongly to deliver them from a bondage which is almost as humiliating as personal servitude itself. I conceive that Congress was authorized to enact a bankrupt law to meet precisely a condition of this kind; and while I can not agree with gentlemen who maintain that because the power has been granted to Congress the Federal structure is therefore incomplete until it has been executed, yet I do believe that if there was ever any wisdom in conferring the power at all, there has seldom been greater need of its exercise than there is at the present time.

It is true, sir, that the country has not recently experienced one of those sudden and violent financial shocks which sometimes overwhelm thousands in a single convulsion; but within the last fifteen years we have suffered several stringencies, all of them more or less severe, and each counting its own victims, until the aggregate has grown to be a very considerable one. Even now we are undergoing a pressure which, though not as acute as others may have been, yet, when considered with reference to its length as well as its severity, it is almost unparalleled in our history. These "financial perturbations," as the President calls them, have stranded many thousands of industrious and enterprising American citizens and left them in a condition where their only refuge from their creditors is a bankrupt court, and their only hope of an opportunity to earn and save a modest competence is a beneficent and wisely guarded bankrupt law. The passage of such a law can work no possible detriment to the creditor, because as matters now stand the debtor will not and can not pay. But if you unfetter his strength and he can hereafter accumulate property, though he hold the judge's certificate of discharge, that does not prevent an honest man from paying his honest debts.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the phase of the question upon which it is my purpose to dwell, because I am confident that a majority of this body are as deeply impressed as I am with the necessity for some proper measure of relief. There are, however, some very radical differences among us as to what constitutes a proper measure of relief; and that is the point to which I desire to address myself during the time that I shall occupy the attention of the House.

Before proceeding to specify what I regard as the vices of the bill under consideration, I will endeavor to briefly state what I consider ought to be the principal object and essential condition of all bankrupt legislation. In the first place, the law ought to be intended primarily for the benefit of debtors; but having emancipated them from their burdens, it ought then, of course, to provide for a fair, cheap, and speedy distribution of their assets among their creditors. I am perfectly sure that eight-tenths of the disinterested men in this country who would vote for a bankrupt law at all would vote for it upon this theory; and it was my own concurrence in it which has prompted me to introduce a bill without any provision for involuntary bankruptcy.

That bill was in such strict conformity with this view, it was so explicit in its terms, and would have been so simple in its operation, that the most serious criticism which the committee have ventured to make upon it is that it blends State and Federal jurisdiction. Mr. Chairman, if that objection is well founded, it is a fatal one; and I would be the first man in this House to insist that no other merit could be sufficient to overcome it. But, sir, if that is the most convincing argument which its adversaries can urge against it, I do not think that it will be a very difficult task to vindicate it against their attack.

The bill provides that any debtor owing $200 or more may make an assignment, valid according to the laws of the State, Territory, or district where he resides, and as to property situated elsewhere, valid according to the law of the place where such property is situated. It further provides that this assignment shall include all of the debtor's property except such as may be exempt from forced sale under the law of his domicile, and shall be for the benefit of all his creditors without preference, except as to debts due for labor and to the State and General governments.

It further provides that a debtor having made this assignment can then file his petition in the Federal courts, alleging under oath a full compliance with the law and praying to be discharged from all further liability for his debts. His creditors are cited to appear and are offered the opportunity to contest his right to this discharge. The Federal court has no more control over the debtor's property than it might have over the property of any insolvent debtor under our existing laws. The only question submitted to it for its determination is the single and simple question whether the debtor has complied with the law in making his assignment. If he has, the judge must discharge him; if he has not, the judge must refuse to discharge him. But in either event the administration of the bankrupt's property is conducted exactly as that of an insolvent assignor to-day. Questions may arise pending its disposition which could be adjudicated either in the State or Federal courts, according as the interested parties might select the one forum or the other. But while this is true under the bill which I have presented, it is not one whit more true than under our present law.

This bill necessitates no change in the forms of practice and pleading now prevailing in the various States; it does not alter in the remotest degree the time, the place, or the manner of settling insolvent estates; it creates no new office, fixes no new charges upon the property, and establishes no new crime. It simply provides that when a debtor has surrendered all of his property for the benefit of all his creditors he shall be entitled to obtain a judgment of acquittance in the Federal court, because the Federal court alone has the power to pronounce such a judgment. How any gentleman can bring himself to believe that this mixes State and Federal authority I confess is entirely beyond my comprehension.

Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say that the bill which I have introduced—but for which I claim no credit, because it is the same bill which was introduced in the Fifty-first Congress by my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. CULBERSON]—is one of the shortest, simplest, least vexatious, and most economical bankrupt laws ever proposed in this or in any other country, and at the proper time I shall offer this bill with some additions and omissions as a substitute for the pending measure.

I assume, sir, that if all debtors were honest there could not be found a Representative on this floor who would contend for the cumbersome, complex, and costly system of involuntary bankruptcy provided for in the bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] as against the simple, brief, and inexpensive system of voluntary bankruptcy provided for in the bill which I shall offer as a substitute. But gentlemen have witnessed the occasional dishonesty of a debtor, and in order to protect creditors from their fraud, have worked themselves up to the point of advocating a measure which can be used to the great injury of honest men. I abhor dishonesty as much as they do, but the difference between me and them is that I esteem it infinitely more important to protect the honest debtor than it is to punish the dishonest one. Besides this, there is already in every State in the Union a law for the collection of debts and for the punishment of dishonest debtors, and I am not willing to add another one which can be and will be employed to oppress and ruin honest and responsible merchants. But, Mr. Chairman, there is nowhere any law under which an honest but unfortunate man can give up his property and be released from all of his debts; and therefore I am willing to vote for one and give these men a fair chance to begin life over again.

I am not perfectly certain, sir, but what the substitute is even better calculated to deal with dishonest debtors; for it appeals to their selfishness and offers them a reward for being honest. It places them in this situation: before they can apply for a discharge they must make a surrender of all of their property. If they act honestly in this transaction they receive their release. If they act dishonestly their property goes for the benefit of their creditors and they are still bound for the balance of their debts. Environed thus I believe that even the dishonest debtor would, as a general rule, disgorge because he will perfectly understand that honest behavior will bring him his release, while dishonest conduct would absorb his property without canceling his debts.

Passing from this hurried review of the bill which I think the committee ought to have favored, but which they have recommended should lie on the table, and coming to the bill which they have reported with a favorable recommendation, I shall confine myself chiefly to a discussion of its second section, because that embraces its most obnoxious features.

It is pertinent, however, to observe in this connection—and this is my answer to the invitation so frequently extended by the gentleman from Alabama, that if we do not like the bill in its present form we ought to amend it—that these objectionable clauses are so interwoven with the entire text, and partake so closely of the nature of the bill that it is impossible to remove them by amendment, because the bill is prepared in consonance with their spirit and to serve their purposes, and any material change in this particular would involve a complete revision of his whole plan.

Taking the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy in the same order in which they appear in the bill, we find that the very first subdivision recognizes three distinct and separate grounds, and each ground independent of all question of the debtor's solvency or insolvency, and without reference to his conduct, at the time the suit may be instituted. Clause 1 provides that—

An act of bankruptcy shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors.

Five months ago a debtor might have found himself in a position that he did not want to face a judgment and he absented himself. He is back at his home to-day, coming in and going out of his place of business, with all of his property in full sight of the officers of the law; and yet if a creditor is willing to allege that five months ago he concealed himself, or that five months ago he departed and remained away from his place of business to avoid process, they can make him a bankrupt and administer upon his solvent estate.

The second ground is that a "debtor has failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed."

This second clause presents, if possible, a more serious objection than the first; and the principle which it involves is simply this, that whenever a man finds it impossible to meet his debts as they mature, his property shall be taken from his possession and control, and although he has made and is making no effort to conceal it, or to defraud his creditors, and although he has done and is doing no dishonest act, yet simply because he is unfortunate and can not release that part of his property which has been levied upon, he is to be deprived of the management of his entire estate, and it must all be devoted to the tedious, expensive and wasteful process of administration in a bankrupt court. The hardship of that section becomes more apparent when you reflect that on many occasions a man's property is attached upon disputed claims. In some States his property can be attached in action of tort, and yet it is written in this bill of abominations that unless he releases the part of it which has been attached, his entire estate must be put into bankruptcy, and he himself disgraced as a dishonest trader.

Many lawyers of great ability and learning have doubted if Congress does not exceed its power when it enacts a bankrupt law which includes a case like this, and they contend that a bankrupt law, as understood by the men who framed our Constitution, contemplated involuntary bankruptcy only in the case of fraudulent conduct on the part of a debtor.

The debate on this provision in the Convention of 1789 was so very meager that no satisfactory conclusion can be drawn from that. Indeed, the only two expressions which I have ever been able to find were, first, the very brief statement of Mr. Sherman—

That bankruptcies were in some cases punishable with death by the laws of England; and he did not choose to grant a power by which that might be done here.

And the equally brief statement of Mr. Morris, that—

This was an extensive and delicate subject; he would agree to it, because he saw no danger of abuse of the power by the Legislature of the United States.

It is certainly true that in England bankrupt laws were originally intended to reach dishonest and absconding traders, and they were regarded as penal in their nature. It was this circumstance which provoked Lord Coke to declare that the English people had "fetched as well the name as the wickedness of bankrupts from foreign nations."

The Federal judge for the district of Missouri, in an elaborate opinion, held the law of 1841 unconstitutional, upon the ground that the only kind of a bankrupt law which Congress could pass was one modeled upon the English system, but Mr. Justice Catron, of the Supreme Court, subsequently announced a different rule, and declared that the Constitutional Convention had in view the State laws as well as the English statutes. My own opinion is that the power of Congress over the subject is, within its other limitations, plenary; but, waiving all question as to the extent to which Congress may go, I affirm that it is a gross abuse of the power to provide that an honest man, simply because he is unfortunate and finds himself unable to pay his debts, shall be dragged into the courts and made a bankrupt against his will. There is not a gentleman on this floor who does not very well understand that there has always existed, and always will exist, a prejudice against a man who once becomes a bankrupt, and every honest citizen ought to be spared that odium unless he is willing himself to attach it to his name. The debtor's misconduct ought to be punished: but it is wanton cruelty to aggravate his misfortunes by supplementing his pecuniary losses with the stigma of involuntary bankruptcy.

CLAUSE NO. 4.

Clause No. 4 makes an assignment without preference, and for the benefit of all creditors alike, a ground for involuntary bankruptcy. In other words, it makes an act which is now lawful in every State in this Union, a ground for this harsh proceeding. If this bill should become a law, an insolvent debtor might owe citizens of his own State, and might have sufficient property to pay such a per cent of his indebtedness as is provided in the State laws shall be sufficient to discharge him; and yet, if he were to make an assignment of all his property for the equal benefit of all his creditors, stripping himself even of his exemptions and leaving his wife and children homeless, yet under this bill his creditors could force him into a bankrupt court without the slightest allegation of fraud against him.

Surely a moment's reflection will deter this House from subjecting an unfortunate man to this criminal process for having done a perfectly honest and lawful act. What good reason can be given for such a course? Statistics show that creditors receive better dividends from assignments made under State insolvent laws than they do under Federal bankrupt laws, and it can not, therefore, be possible that this procedure is expected to directly secure better financial results. What then can be the purpose of it? Is it an indirect result which they aim to accomplish? The true explanation of it is that the bill will subject the retail dealers of the country to a species of judicial duress, and it can be used to coerce them into doing the wholesale merchant's bidding. If the retail debtor refuses to comply with the wholesale creditor's demand, it transfers the controversy to the Federal courts, and this fact is relied on to bring the recalcitrant debtor to terms. For years there has been a growing tendency in all of the great centers of trade to decry State tribunals and State laws, and many gentlemen of the bar who have been extensively employed by wholesale merchants have joined in this unjust and indiscriminate disparagement of the courts in their own States. This deliberate effort to destroy public confidence in the State judiciary has been repeated so often, and with such emphasis, that many men have come to doubt both their justice and their wisdom. This bill crystallizes that sentiment into law, and its evident purpose is, as its inevitable effect must be, to denude State tribunals of their proper jurisdiction, and to concentrate the entire commercial business of the country in the Federal courts. This means that the fees which have heretofore gone to the support of State and county officials must henceforth go to the vast army of functionaries which it creates. This would be bad enough if it stopped here, but this is not all, nor is it the worst. The change is pregnant with a greater mischief. It remits all questions arising out of mercantile transactions to Federal judges for decision, and this means that the whole body of our commercial law is to be revolutionized.

I may exaggerate the importance of this point, but unless Democrats have been playing the demagogue in their immemorial resistance to the extension of the Federal judiciary, it is not easy to compute the possibilities of evil with which this bill is fraught. It ought to be styled a bill to convert Federal courts into debt-collecting agencies.

CLAUSE NO. 5.

Clause No. 5 is an effort to legislate, in an indirect way, against a practice which many of us believe to be hurtful, but which may or may not have the slightest reference to the solvency or misconduct of the man who engages in it. If there is any desire on the part of Congress, and if Congress possesses the power to suppress trading of this kind, it ought to be done in an open and direct way, and not be made a part of a bill which has no necessary connection with the evil.

CLAUSE 6.

Clause 6 provides for involuntary bankruptcy where the debtor attempts, either by an assignment or by process of law, to give one creditor a preference over another.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a legislative decree that hereafter all debts shall stand upon exactly the same footing. As for my part, I do not belive that it is true in morals, and I do not believe that it ought to be made true in law, that all debts are of equal obligation. Certainly all of them bind the conscience of the debtor to pay them if he can, but there has been an almost unanimous agreement among men for centuries that debts contracted for trust funds, and debts incurred to creditors who have dealt with the debtor for his accommodation and not for their profit, are of higher sanctity than other debts.

Indeed, I can conceive a case where both debts are contracted in the usual course of trade and where profit was equally the incentive of both creditors, and yet any honest man would prefer to pay one rather than the other. The instance which presents itself to my mind is this: If I owed $5,000 to a man who possessed nothing else and I owed $25,000 to a man who was many times a millionaire, and I found myself in such a situation that it was impossible to pay them both, I would not hesitate a single moment about my duty. I would pay the man who would be reduced to poverty by my failure to pay, and I would leave unpaid the man who could suffer the loss without the least inconvenience, or even an abatement of the luxuries which he now enjoys.

There is still another case, and one of frequent occurrence. It often happens that a business man finds himself embarrassed by being unable to readily realize upon his property. In such a contingency he goes to some friend, lays before him his financial condition, and solicits the advance of a sum sufficient to tide him over his present difficulties, and the friend consents to aid him upon an agreement that if the debtor finds it impossible to safely adjust his matters, he will under all circumstances protect the man who loans him the money, not for profit, but purely for the sake of helping him. If you make an act like that a quasi criminal one, as this bill does, thousands of honest merchants will hereafter find themselves forced into bankruptcy because they could not procure an accommodation at the critical time when it would have saved both their credit and their fortune.

And again: It frequently happens that one man indorses for another without the least thought of pecuniary advantage, and I undertake to say that there is not an honest man who does not feel in his heart that the debt upon which his friend is security is of higher obligation than the one to some other man which represents less than the profits which were made on the transaction in which it was given.

Permit me to state an illustration that will enforce my position better than any argument I can make. Suppose the gentleman from Alabama had bought a piece of property in the city of Birmingham three years ago for $50,000 and that he had paid $20,000 in cash, and given his three notes for $10,000 each, stipulating that the failure to pay one should mature all. When the first became due, he found it impossible to meet it, it was extended until now and the creditor demands payment; but in the depressed condition of the market he can not pay; the creditor in default advertises and sells under his deed of trust, and bids it in—as he easily could do at the present time—for $20,000, thus leaving a balance due upon the notes of $10,000, and the interest. Now mark the result of this.

The creditor was paid $20,000 when the property was purchased, but under the depreciation in market values he has been able to keep the purchaser's $20,000; to buy the property in at a forced sale, and to leave the purchaser still in debt to him. Now let us go a step further and suppose that when the gentleman was raising the $20,000 to make the initial payment, he found it necessary to borrow $5,000, and a friend had indorsed his note for that sum. It is impossible for him to pay that note on which his friend is security and to pay the $10,000 balance on the property.

Will any man contend that the creditor who has his $20,000 in money and the property also should be permitted to share the remnant of his estate equally with the creditor to whom his friend is an accommodation indorser? The question answers itself. There may be men who will vote to let him do so, but there is not a man amongst us who will have the hardihood to rise and say he ought to do so.

But, sir, there is a stronger case than all these. Suppose a widow, feeling her incompetence to manage her own affairs and realizing how helpless she would be if her little fortune should be swept away, were to intrust it to her dead husband's friend, thinking it would be safer with him than with other people. His business might then be prosperous and he might not be willing to impair his credit by recording a mortgage for her security. Indeed, his condition might be such at that time as to render such precaution unnecessary, and yet the whirligig of Time, which brings in his revenges as well as his revenges, might soon reduce the prosperous merchant to the point where he found it impossible to pay all of his debts. Will any man insist that the New York wholesale merchant who had dealt with him for years purely for the profit of his trade, and who had realized immense profits upon his sales to the unfortunate debtor, should be paid equally with the widow?

Will any man contend for such a proposition as that? The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], in the course of his speech upon this subject at the last session, said, with some show of indignation, that the law recognizes no distinction between rich and poor creditors, and he seemed to think that a satisfactory answer to this suggestion which I then made. But the gentleman misunderstood my proposition. I have never said and I do not now say that the law ought to establish these distinctions, but what I said then and what I say now is, that the law ought to permit the debtor himself to make them if he desires to do so. This is no innovation. It is no novel doctrine. It is consonant with the principles of the common law, which during its long growth of centuries has attained the perfection of reason as well as of justice. If he is right, then, sir, the wisest judges and the most upright chancellors that ever adorned the bench in this country and in England have for two hundred years been wrong, but if I err, I do so with men in whose company it can be no discredit to be found.

The difference between us is perhaps more a difference of legal training than of moral fiber. The gentleman from Louisiana was trained in the civil law, which regards the property of the debtor as a trust fund in which all his creditors must equally share. I studied the common law, which permits a man in failing circumstances to discriminate among his creditors and to prefer those having the highest or most peculiar claims upon him.

I am willing that a debtor who prefers one creditor over another should be denied the benefit of a discharge from the debt which he has postponed. But when we have gone this far we have gone far enough. In ordinary cases the desire to be relieved will be an ample inducement to prevent all preferences, but in extraordinary cases the debtor should be free to judge the moral obligation upon him, and if in respecting that he pays one creditor and leaves others unpaid, it is sufficient to exclude him from the benefit of the law.

I think an American citizen ought to be left some option even in dealing with his creditors. I do not believe he ought to be reduced to a state of pupilage, or put in a judicial strait-jacket and compelled to do everything according to the directions of a statute. I believe in allowing him some choice; and if you deny him the benefaction which the Constitution has provided he may enjoy, unless he consents to let the rich, who possess no especial claim upon him, share equally with the poor, to whom he owes everything and who would be ruined by a failure on his part to meet his obligations to them, then I believe that most of the honest debtors of this land would prefer to remain in their present condition.

These peculiar and extraordinary cases will occur, and they have occurred in the lives of most of us. Many of us have been under obligations which we would have canceled, if in so doing we should leave ourselves steeped in poverty to our lips for the remainder of our lives; and I simply plead for the right of the American citizen to respect the moral obligations which all men must recognize and every man ought religiously to keep.

CLAUSE 10.

Clause 10 probably finds its proper place by coming last, for it is the crowning infamy of an infamous section. It provides that an insolvent person who has suspended and not resumed for thirty days the payment of his commercial paper, aggregating $500 and over, may be made a bankrupt. It has been attempted to mitigate the rigor of this section by a special definition of the word "insolvent," in what has been aptly called "the dictionary" of this bill. In the bill as reported to the last Congress, this clause stood exactly as it now appears, without any attempt to define "insolvency."

Under it as then proposed, 80 per cent of the business men in America to-day could be despoiled of their property. Not that I intend to say that 80 per cent of our business men are insolvent within the ordinary meaning of the term, but I do say that more than 80 per cent of them are insolvent within the meaning of that word as understood in bankrupt legislation. It does not mean that a man must have less property than enough to pay his debts, but within the meaning of a bankrupt law any man who can not meet his liabilities from day to day and from time to time as they mature, is insolvent.

In order that there shall be no misunderstanding on this point, I desire to read to the House a paragraph from a decision of the Supreme Court, made in the case of Buchanan vs. Smith, and reported in 16 Wallace. The court in that case declared:

> Insolvency in the sense of a bankrupt act means that the party whose business affairs are in question is unable to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of his daily transactions.

In view of the well-settled definition of "insolvent" within the meaning of a bankrupt law, the friends of this bill have been compelled to substitute the vague and indefinite one, that "insolvent" "shall hereafter mean that a man has not sufficient property at a fair valuation to pay his debts." The objection to this is that during a time like this, which is the very time when men would be most threatened with these proceedings, a "fair valuation" of any man's property would be less than one-third its value under ordinary circumstances.

Gentlemen do not need to be admonished that the courts will exercise no liberality toward the debtor in construing this provision. On the contrary, the construction is certain to be against the debtor's interest. I say that it will be under this law, because we all know that it was under the other law. They went so far in construing the word for which this definition is now a substitute as to give it a meaning in bankrupt proceedings entirely different from its meaning in the other transactions of life. The court itself declares in Toof vs. Martin, 13 Wallace 47:

> The term "insolvency" is not always used in the same sense. It is sometimes used to denote the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts. This is its general and popular meaning. But it is also used in a more restricted sense to express the inability of a party to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. It is in this latter sense that the term is used when traders and merchants are said to be insolvent, and as applied to them it is the sense intended by the act of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit, then, that it is a fair inference if the Supreme Court gives the word "insolvent" a different meaning when applied to bankrupt proceedings from what it possesses in ordinary transactions, by the same rule they must construe "fair valuation" more strictly in bankrupt proceedings than in other lawsuits. Assuming that to be true—and it is certain that it will be true—then it must follow that many solvent and responsible men will be embarrassed whenever a financial crisis like the present overtakes the country.

Mr. OATES. What does my friend say about the rule of interpretation which requires a statute which is in derogation of rights under the common law to be construed strictly or latitudinously?

Mr. BAILEY. The decision from which I have quoted was rendered in a statutory proceeding; and if they construed the term in derogation of the common law in that, why would they not be expected to construe it the same way in reference to the same character of a statute?

Mr. OATES. But the language used in this provision is different and more liberal.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but the courts have established the rule that certain words mean one thing in ordinary transactions and another and different thing in bankrupt proceedings.

Mr. OATES. This bill——

Mr. BAILEY. I must decline to yield. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama, but it will be impossible, even if I am permitted to continue without interruption, to conclude the argument I had desired to make.

Mr. Chairman, fortunately we are not left to speculate as to what will be the effect of such a law in such a time as this. We are justified in asserting that it will embarrass many responsible men, because it, or rather a milder law did embarrass many responsible men throughout the country under similar circumstances. In proof of this I send to the Clerk's desk an extract from the message of President Grant transmitted to Congress in 1873, and I especially commend this to the Republican side of the House. The Clerk will please read what I have indicated with pencil marks.

The Clerk read as follows:

> I have become impressed with the belief that the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," is productive of more evil than good at this time. Many considerations might be urged for its total repeal, but if this is not considered advisable I think it will not be seriously questioned that those portions of said act providing for what is called involuntary bankruptcy operate to increase the financial embarrassments of the country. Careful and prudent men very often become involved in debt in the transaction of their business, and though they may possess ample property, if it could be made available for that purpose, to meet all their liabilities, yet, on account of the extraordinary scarcity of money, they may be unable to meet all their pecuniary obligations as they become due, in consequence of which they are liable to be prostrated in their business by proceedings in bankruptcy at the instance of unrelenting creditors.
> People are now so easily alarmed as to monetary matters that the mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy by an unfriendly creditor will necessarily embarrass, and oftentimes accomplish the financial ruin of a responsible business man. Those who otherwise might make lawful and just arrangements to relieve themselves from difficulties produced by the present stringency in money, are prevented by their constant exposure to attack and disappointment by proceedings against them in bankruptcy, and beside the law is made use of in many cases by obdurate creditors to frighten or force debtors into a compliance with their wishes and into acts of injustice to other creditors and to themselves. I recommend that so much of said act as provides for involuntary bankruptcy on account of the suspension of payment be repealed.

Mr. BAILEY. The President suggested the entire repeal of the law, but concludes that if it is not deemed advisable to attempt this that at least there should be stricken from it the provision similar to the one which I am now discussing. I submit to the dispassionate judgment of the House whether they are willing to incorporate into this law a provision more drastic than the one which the President advised Congress to eliminate from the old law. Gentlemen, I do not doubt your sincerity or your integrity, but I do doubt—and you must pardon me for doubting, your capacity to make the worst bankrupt bill ever submitted to Congress produce better results than the better laws which have gone before it.

This section of the bill contains another and a very serious danger. It invites a man's enemies to take advantage of a time like this and to drive an honest debtor of ample resources either to sacrifice his property or become a bankrupt. I have in my mind at this moment a gentleman who owns more than a half a million dollars' worth of property, consisting largely of valuable lands, and who owes less than $200,000, and yet under this bill he could be forced into bankruptcy and his splendid fortune wasted.

Ah, but gentlemen say his creditors would not proceed against a man in his condition. That does not satisfy me. I am not willing to put it in their power to do so, because a creditor's generosity is not always a safe reliance. Some of them are just and liberal, but many of them are cruel and vindictive, and the worst among them can easily set the machinery of this law in motion.

Mr. HUDSON. They are generally the men that do it.

Mr. BAILEY. And they are generally the men who do it, as my friend near me suggests. The motives of revenge frequently impel a creditor as well as other people, though the committee seem to have wrought themselves into a belief that creditors are men of surpassing magnanimity, and in their report, written last year and ratified this year, they fall into a poetic mood, and with hearts overflowing in compassion for the unfortunate, they repeat Portia's beautiful and famous panegyric on mercy.

I regret that the distinguished gentleman in charge of this bill should have missed the moral which that great play was designed to teach. With all of his sordid love for gold, a still stronger passion possessed the mind of Shylock. It could not have escaped an attentive reader that it was not the money which moved the Venetian Jew to insist upon the hard conditions of his bond; for he refused that thrice over. It was his desire to be revenged on Antonio, who, as he said, had rated him about his usuries and railed against his sacred nation. [Laughter and applause.]

It is as true to-day as it was in the time of which Shakespeare wrote—indeed, that marvelous-minded man inculcated none but enduring truths—and it is as true now as it was then that the creditor is sometimes as remorseless in his study of revenge as he is in his pursuit of gain.

There are other provisions in this bill equaling in their outrage the ones which I have enumerated. On page 11 they reestablish the barbarous custom of imprisonment for debt. It is true they do it under another name, and they call it a detention; but it is none the less true that it restrains the American citizen from coming and going as he pleases; and this though he is guilty of no crime and is charged with none. His creditors may file an involuntary petition against him, may take his property from him, destroy his business, ruin his credit; broken down and humiliated among his old friends and at his old home, he might desire to seek a new place in which to rehabilitate himself and regain his fortune, and yet one of these same creditors who had inflicted this unspeakable distress upon him could file an affidavit that the debtor was about to leave the district, and that his departure would defeat the proceedings, and the judge would forbid him to go.

He may sit for weeks at the bedside of a sick child, watching the roses fade out of its cheek and the light die out of its eyes, and he may have spent what little the law, in merciful exemption, had allowed him, and when it is gone he dare not go to find a new employment because the judge has forbidden him to leave the jurisdiction of that bankrupt court.

I do not want to be offensive to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], but he will permit me to marvel that, in the evening of the nineteenth century, there can be found an American Democrat who will champion a provision of such heartless cruelty as that.

Not only will they detain the bankrupt against his will while they divide his property among his creditors, but even after a full trial and a solemn discharge from all further liability for his debts the relentless creditor still has two years in which to reopen the question and recommit the debtor to a condition of bankruptcy. It has been asserted that this is the law in other cases, but I take it that no man who is careful of his reputation as a lawyer will be willing to express that opinion in the records of this Congress. If it were the general law, then there would be no need for it as a special provision in this bill, but it is not the law in any other instance and it ought not to be the law in this.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], in a colloquy with my colleague [Mr. KILGORE], demanded to know if my colleague thought that a man who had obtained his discharge by fraud or perjury ought to be permitted to enjoy it. My colleague very promptly answered no, and I join him in that answer. But I am not willing to stop there, because that is entirely too narrow a view of the question. I concede to the gentleman from Louisiana that a man who has obtained his release by fraud or perjury ought not to have the advantage of it, but it is equally true that a man who has been honestly discharged ought not to be subjected to a second suit by an implacable creditor. The perjured man ought not to go free. The honest man ought not to be vexed a second time. It is impossible to permit a reopening of the question in order to uncover the dishonest debtor without at the same time providing the dissatisfied creditor with an opportunity to persecute the honest debtor. Therefore, I say, the matter having once been fully tried, that ought to be an end of it; and in this opinion I am sustained not only by the reason and the justice of it, but by the decision of the highest courts in this and other countries.

The Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon this question in the case of The United States vs. Throckmorton; and as ready as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] may be to dispute with my colleague about a legal proposition, I assume that he will not be swift to differ with the Supreme Court of the United States, especially when it follows the authorities both in this country and in England.

One of the earliest cases in England, as I recall it, was a case in which a direct and absolute perjury had been committed as to a question of value, and it was sought to set aside the judgment because it had been obtained by the perjury of a partner of the successful litigant; but the court said: "It must have been known that the question of price would be an issue of fact in this case, and the parties ought to have been prepared to prove it; and the case will not be reopened."

The main question here is the fraud of the bankrupt. That is the very issue in the proceeding to discharge him; and yet they provide that after the matter has been fully tried, creditors can go back into the court and say they want it retried. Twenty-three months after the first trial, when the discharged bankrupt has gone about his business and accumulated more property, the rapacious creditor can say to him, "Bring it back into the bankrupt court. You were not fairly discharged in the first instance." And this law requires the debtor to come back and bring his property with him.

I commend to the gentleman from Louisiana the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States against Throckmorton. It declares:

> There are no maxims of law more fully established and more valuable in the administration of justice than the two which are designed to prevent repeated litigation between the same parties in regard to the same subject matter.

And after quoting the two Latin maxims that "it is to the public interest that there shall be an end to litigation," and that "no man should be vexed the second time in reference to the same question," it then goes on to say:

> But there is an admitted exception to this general rule in cases where by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case. Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case, by fraud or deception practiced on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise, or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff, or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connive at his defeat, or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side, these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case, are reasons for which a new suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree, and open the case for a new and a fair hearing.

> On the other hand, the doctrine is equally well settled that the court will not set aside a judgment because it was founded on a fradulent instrument, or perjured evidence, or for any matter which was actually presented and considered in the judgment assailed.

I have here the case of Smith vs. Lowry, reported in the first volume of Johnson's Chancery Reports. It is a leading case and Chancellor Kent lays down the same doctrine. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a long discussion of the question, quotes the decision of Chancellor Kent with approval. I have here the celebrated and leading case of Green against Green, reported in 2d Gray's Mass. Reports; and it holds the same doctrine. It is the uniform and unvarying rule of all the courts that after a full hearing the decision shall conclude the matter between the parties; and yet these gentlemen, in their anxiety for creditors and in their determination to despoil the debtors of the land, have reversed the rules which were framed for the repose of society and which have stood for a hundred years.

They do not stop there. In the very next section of the bill they insert another innovation for the creditor's benefit. Section 15 provides that—

> The liability of a person who is a co-debtor with, or guarantor or in any manner a surety for, a bankrupt shall not be altered by the discharge of such bankrupt.

That would be just and reasonable and in accordance with the well-settled principles of the common law if it simply provided that the surety should not be discharged when the principal obtained his own release by a voluntary bankruptcy; but it is a principle as old as the law of suretyship and as just as it is old, that when the payee himself and by his own conduct discharges or procures the discharge of the principal he can not then recover from the surety. Under this bill, however, the creditor can drag the debtor into a bankrupt court, can waste his estate, can release him from all his obligations, including his obligation to reimburse his surety, and yet he can still hold the surety upon a contract which on his own application the law has annulled.

All this makes it manifest that the bill is a creditors' bill; but if any further evidence were needed to satisfy any sensible man on that point it could be found in the methods of procedure which are legalized. In this part of their work the authors of this iniquity have exhibited a facility in hedging about the debtor that would do credit to the devilish ingenuity of the monks of the feudal ages. They have provided that almost everything that the court can do at all can be done summarily and without giving the defendant a fair opportunity to prepare for his defense. The bill says that "upon the filing of an involuntary petition process shall issue and shall be returnable within fifteen days".

Three hundred miles may intervene between the place where it must be served and the court to which it is returnable, but after it is returnable the defendant has only ten days in which to plead. Then they provide that in controversies pending upon appeal they shall within ten days after they are returnable, be set down for hearing at a day as soon as possible. In the case of appeals or writs of error they shall be taken within ten days after the order from which they are taken has been granted. All through this bill, Mr. Chairman, there runs this heartless purpose to do this brutal work with as much dispatch as possible.

All the other business of the courts must wait upon these bankrupt proceedings. Yes, sir, the orphan may hunger while the faithless guardian withholds her portion; the American citizen may languish in a common jail awaiting his tardy trial upon a false accusation; the condemned man may stand within the shadow of the scaffold, but all these must wait the law's ordinary course and its disheartening delay, while the clamors of a conscienceless creditor must be heard and determined with almost indecent haste. [Applause.]

Aye, sir, and more; the judge must always be ready to pass upon these questions—"in term time and in vacation." His court must never close, but its doors, like the gates of hell, must stand forever open to receive their victims, and it is fitting that over their archway should be written the inscription which the imperial imagination of Dante traced over the portals of the Inferno: "All hope abandon ye who enter here." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I appeal especially to the Democrats of this House. Are you willing to vote for a law like this—such a law as the Democratic party in all its history has never dared to pass? Every party that has ever obtained control of the Government has passed one except the Democratic party. The first bankrupt law was passed by the Federalists in 1800, and by its terms it was to continue in force for five years, but it was so unpopular that it was repealed in less than three years by a vote of 99 to 13 in this House. The Whigs, having been swept into victory on the great tidal wave of 1840, signalized their accession to power by the enactment of the bankrupt law of 1841. It was argued in favor of the law that conditions had changed, and that what might have been unwise and inexpedient in 1800 might be extremely desirable in 1841. The passage of that bankrupt act contributed more to the destruction of the Whig party than any other single circumstance except their disagreement with President Tyler. The law became so abhorrent to the country that absolutely the same Congress which passed it repealed it within eighteen months. In 1867 the Republicans enacted their bankrupt law. In six years after its enactment their great leader and chieftain, in a solemn message to Congress, advised its repeal. You have tried three involuntary bankrupt laws. You have tried them at three different periods in your history. You have tried them under three different conditions. You have tried them under the administration of three different sets of officers, and every one of them has proved a signal failure.

In the face of that history, I appeal to you, will the Democratic party, in the present condition of the country, pass the only bankrupt law that it has ever been inclined to pass, and that the worst law that anybody has ever dared to propose? Will you do it? If you do, the consequences shall not be upon my head.

But, Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning there ought to be some relief measure passed. Let us try to frame such a measure. We know that an involuntary one will not do, because we have tried it and found it wanting. Let us try what never has been tried in the history of this country—a simple voluntary bankrupt law, under which an honest man can give up all his property and be emancipated from all his debts. I am willing to take my share of responsibility for the trial of a measure of that kind, because if it does disappoint the people in its results, they can not charge us with the infatuation of disregarding all the lessons of history.

I am exceedingly anxious to see this Congress pass a bankrupt law, and while I would prefer to have one purely voluntary in its character, yet, rather than have none at all, I am willing to yield something. Indeed, I am willing to yield everything which can be safely yielded without sacrificing the solvent debtors of the land in an effort to relieve the insolvent ones; but anxious as I am to lift from the shoulders of worthy and helpless citizens the great burden which is crushing out their manhood and their spirit, I can not and will not vote for this bill, because it is certain to destroy more men in the future than it can possibly save at the present time.

It is intended for the benefit of creditors, with scarcely more than incidental benefit to debtors. In other words, and in plain words, sir, it uses the power vested in Congress to enact a bankrupt law merely as a predicate on which to construct a worse than Federal attachment law. I say it is worse, for the very good reason that it permits involuntary bankruptcy for causes where the laws of no State have ever permitted an attachment, and those who invoke its aid against their debtors are not required to give a bond, as they are in attachment cases, and are not amenable in damages for the wrongful institution of their suits.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill must pass, for God's sake let us end this disgraceful farce of legislating always in the name of the debtor and for the benefit of the creditor—mocking one with an empty profession of our good will and giving to the other the law which his avarice craves. It may be, sir, that the creditors of this land are entitled to additional remedies in the collection of their debts; it may be that the debtors deserve to be harassed with new and penal statutes, but if so let us boldly proclaim the fact, and like men let us meet our responsibility for acting in accordance with it.

If we can not be wise and we will not be just, let us at least be bold; for courage more than half redeems a sin. Let us discard the miserable and false pretense that this bill has been framed and is supported in the interest of the debtors, and let us avow what all of us know to be the truth, that it is intended for the better security of men to whom all the courts are now open and whose process all the officers of the law are ready and willing to execute. That is its object. Many gentlemen have been candid enough to say so. Ah, sir, throughout the entire course of this debate it has been iterated and reiterated that the passage of this bill is demanded by the business interests of the country. That many wholesale dealers demand it, I have no doubt; but I do most seriously doubt if it finds any favor with millions of conservative retail dealers scattered all over the land.

I do not believe that it can promote the real commercial prosperity of all classes and of the whole country. But even if I thought it would accomplish that result, I could not be reconciled to its support in its present shape, because it violates in many particulars what I deem to be the fundamental principles of natural and political justice. It subordinates the highest interests which can concern a people like ours to the mere matter of collecting the trader's dollars and cents. That, sir, is not the kind of legislation which commends itself to my judgment. In fact there is no tendency of this time better calculated to alarm the thoughtful and patriotic observer than the disposition manifested everywhere—in legislative assemblies as well as in business circles—to regard money-making as the chief end of law making, and material progress as the surest means to make a nation great and render its institutions perpetual. This mercantile spirit is a withering curse, and the people whom it once enthralls are lost. It is a political leprosy whose deadly taint never has been and never can be eradicated, and I am not ready to hand over the laws and customs of my devoted country to its baleful influence.

I am not insensible to the advantages of national wealth and commercial supremacy, but all the fabled riches of the Orient multiplied a thousandfold, and the unrestricted commerce of every land and of all the seas are not comparable to that peace and that content which consecrate the hearts of a brave and free people to the service of a just and frugal government. [Applause.] We are already consuming too many of the vital forces of individual and national life in this nervous and ceaseless struggle to become richer. Instead of yielding to the tendency, the legislator's first and highest duty is to resist it, and reverse it if it still be possible to do so. We need to be educated in an opposite direction from that in which we have been going for thirty years. We need to know that opulence breeds idleness, and idleness breeds decay. Strive as we will, we can not altogether subdue that greed which has been the bane of all free governments, and which infects the blood of a republic with a poison more fatal than all the precepts and examples of communists and madmen.

There is among the traditions of Venice a beautiful legend of a wonderful painting by Michael Angelo. As I recall it now, it tells the story of how a young girl, after years of patient waiting and vain entreaty for her father's consent to a marriage with the man she loved, finally despaired, and stepping from a gondola she sought to bury herself and her sorrow beneath the waters which make the streets of her native city. She was rescued by a stranger, to whom she revealed her grief, and who, becoming interested in her fate, interceded upon her own and her lover's behalf. The father was inflexible. The great artist guessed the secret of the old man's opposition to be that the boy was poor, and asked if the marriage could be consummated when the youth had acquired a competence. The father said "no;" but his looks returned a different answer. As they sat there discussing the young people, the wonderful genius took from his pocket a tablet and with fingers defter than ever touched a canvas he drew the picture of a miser's hand and holding it up to the old man's astonished gaze he wrung from his unconscious lips the startled exclamation, "Why, that is my hand! That is my hand!" And so it was. With its grasping and eager lines, with its palm half open as if waiting to catch a shower of gold, it portrayed the miser's ruling passion. Angelo gave it to the disconsolate lover and told him to sell it to the library of St. Mark's; and its price became the ransom of a true and noble wife. In after years that picture became the most famous of that famous collection; and historians say that it helped to make the vice of avarice still more detestable in that republic.

We need some new Angelo in this age and country who, gifted with a divine inspiration, can put upon the painter's canvas the hideous features of modern greed and help us to relearn the lesson which our sturdy and self-reliant fathers taught, that freedom is better than commerce, and justice is better than gold. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, in rising to close the general debate on this bill I intend to review briefly the most pungent charges which have been made against the measure. Having charge of this bill as the representative of my committee, I have a duty to perform; and I am going to discharge that duty fairly. I intend to review the most salient features of objection that have been interposed to the measure; and I invite the attention of gentlemen to what I have to say.

THE "BULLS" AND "BEARS" OF LEGISLATION.

We have in this country, as I suppose there are in every other, two classes of statesmen or legislators. The one class are the originators, those who frame and introduce bills of an important character, or endeavor to perfect bills originated by others, for the benefit of all the people over whom and on whom such legislation operates. Those who undertake to do this usually have a most difficult task to perform. Those who succeed in obtaining the enactment of laws for the benefit of mankind are in fact the Franklins, the Morses, the Fultons, and the Edisons of legislation. Some who have sufficient inventive genius or originality of thought do not possess the courage to withstand criticism. These originators are unfortunately fewer and further between than those of the other class, which is composed of gentlemen many of whom make much reputation simply by being in the negative and exercising their ingenuity not in inventing or introducing measures, but in defeating and tearing down those originated by others. The Democratic members of this House have so long been accustomed to doing battle in the negative that they can not realize that the laboring oar of legislation is now in their hands and they are expected to do something for the relief of the people. One class I may characterize as the "bulls" and the others as the "bears" of legislation.

Now, who is entitled to the most reputation? Which of the two has the more difficult task in earning a reputation? Infinitely the first. Many men can fit themselves for negative work with but little preparation or study. They do not have to originate anything, except to study criticisms and rules by which they can embarrass others who undertake to originate important legislation. Suppose that we were all of this class? It is hard to originate and build up, but comparatively easy to tear down and destroy. I do not claim to be distinctively either, but if we were all of this negative class we would certainly carry out the doctrine of some gentlemen that the wisdom of legislation is to do nothing at all. If that were the case, what would become of the country? That some legislation is necessary all will admit.

MR. BAILEY'S MISAPPREHENSIONS.

I have listened to this debate very attentively; and my young friend who has just preceded me I am glad to say has not misrepresented so many of the provisions of this bill, nor to such an extent, as many of his more experienced associates in opposition who have preceded him. But I wish to notice a few of the misrepresentations or misconceptions made by him. And I want to say just here that in replying to the criticisms and objections made to the bill I do it in the best of spirit and not with the intention of wounding the feelings of any gentleman, for I respect all.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has compared the bill, or the spirit in which it was constructed, to that of Shylock; and said that I and others who advocated the bill had not read that play to advantage; that the animus of the Jew was not to obtain his money, but to gratify his malice. Well, it may have been delightful to the gentleman to have used this figure of speech, but how much truth is there in it? Is there a man here who believes that anyone who will record his vote for this bill has the slightest possible particle of malice toward anyone in so doing? Where is the creditor who wants legislation in order to enable him to use it as a gratification of the mean passion of malice? Why, the comparison is utterly inappropriate. It has no application whatever to the question before us, and therefore I shall not consider it in connection with the bill.

What a creditor wants is his money, and where is the creditor who does not want his money? That is the great stimulus of all of us so far as our connection with business affairs is concerned. That is the stimulus that moves the wheels of government and of all human institutions. But we certainly are agreed that, as the representatives of an honest people, we will only do our duty if we undertake to pass any law affecting debtor and creditor so that it will operate justly and not harshly upon either. What right have we as legislators, in view of justice, to assume the cause of either the debtors or creditors as such? What we want and what we should desire is the enactment of law which will do justice as far as it is within the limits of human power to administer justice between man and man.

On the question of the speed or haste with which this law is to be executed, said my friend from Texas, "It is indecent," and that remark was met by the applause of some gentlemen who have not studied to any great purpose the bill or the facts of legislative history in this connection in the United States or elsewhere.

Why, my friends, look at the judicial systems of your States. They are not to-day as they were when you and I were born. There is a constant spirit of progress, and there ought to be. Some of the newer States are found to be far in advance of the older ones for the speedy administration of justice.

Take California, for instance, the furthest west where the creditor brings his suit in the court of common law to recover his money. The debtor must respond in ten days or an office judgment goes. The case is at issue, and if a jury is demanded it is drawn and the trial proceeds; and yet, according to my friend from Texas, that would be "indecent haste." The Constitution of my State declares that justice shall be administered without sale, denial, or delay; and that declaration is found in most of your State constitutions. Is it carried out when the courts are postponed and creditors are denied the right of bringing their suits and having them heard until the claim is so old that it has become worthless? Speedy administration of justice is called for in the States, and yet the opponents of this bill denounce it and call ten days ("or such further time as the court may allow") "indecent haste."

Mr. Chairman, in their criticisms made by the gentleman from Texas and several others who preceded him, they have taken occasion to comment upon section 8 of the bill which provides that—a bankrupt shall be exempt from apprehension upon civil process, except upon a warrant from a court of bankruptcy, (1) unless the same is founded upon some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not be a release—

And the comment is made that this is imprisonment for debt without inquiry as to what it is from which he is not released, or in what case a debtor may be arrested. I never in my life favored imprisonment for debt. On the contrary, I have ever vigorously opposed it. It was a barbarous practice, and I rejoice that it has been abolished. Can any man read the story of Dickens' chancery prisoner and afterwards favor imprisonment for debt? It was a barbarous practice. And then—

(2) When in attendance upon such a court or at the first meeting of his creditors, or when actually engaged in the performance of a duty enjoined by this act or prescribed by order of court.

The disobedience of that would be contempt of judicial authority, and that may always be dealt with; and to deprive the court of it is at once to set up in opposition a disrespect to our courts, which would render them unable to administer justice.

The debts from which they will not discharge are such as a man owes which are of a fiduciary character, such as guardian and trustee, and some others named, which no bankruptcy law should discharge.

Some of the newspapers have denounced those who support this bill as being absolutely wanting in humanity because it is said they favor imprisonment for debt. This has resulted from the grossest kind of ignorance or malice.

Section 8 further provides:

b The judge may, at any time after the filing of a petition by or against a person and before the expiration of six months after he has been adjudged a bankrupt, upon affidavit of any party in interest that such bankrupt is about to leave the district and—

Not as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] said, if he had a sick child that he could not go to it, but in cruelty is to be held and let his child die without ever seeing it, but—upon affidavit of any party in interest that such bankrupt is about to leave the district and that his departure will defeat the proceedings therein—

That is, in that case; then what?

issue a warrant to the marshal directing him to bring such bankrupt forthwith before the court; if upon hearing the evidence it shall appear to the judge that the allegations of such affidavit are true, and that it is necessary—

What then?

He shall order such marshal to keep such bankrupt in custody, but not imprison him, until he shall be released or give bail conditioned for his appearance, from time to time, as required by the court and for his obedience to all lawful orders.

Is that imprisonment for debt? Why, it negatives the idea and says he shall not be imprisoned. It is simply a detention of him when he is about to depart from the jurisdiction of the court, and such departure or running away will defeat the proceedings against him; when that fact is shown by affidavit, and that his departure would defeat the proceedings in the cause, if he does not negative it he can be held, but not imprisoned, yet the manufacturers of facts say it is imprisonment for debt when they know better. Then he is to be brought before the court, and the court then and there inquires into the allegations of the affidavit to see whether they be true. If not true, or if the man had a dying child outside of the jurisdiction of the court, and was to show or to make affidavit to the court that that was his object in going, where is the judge who would require his detention? There is no one so inhuman. I have opposed imprisonment for debt all my life and always will.

It is an easy matter to pervert the English language so as to make it mean just the reverse of what it does mean, and the enemies of this bill have been most artful therein, though it is the only measure yet brought before Congress for the relief of the debt-burdened people.

All I ask is that you look into it and give it its true meaning; and all through this bill, if you find that in the drafting of it a mistake has been made, so that on a fair construction it conveys a meaning contrary to that intended, or one which will operate harshly against justice to either creditor or debtor, or any party in interest, you will have an opportunity when I conclude my remarks to correct that error by amendment. I intend to propose some amendments myself.

No man is so perfect, and no number of men are so perfect that they can draft a bill of sixty-odd pages of print and have every clause and provision free from error. There may be some error discovered by such a number of learned gentlemen as we have here in this House; and I, as the custodian of this bill, for this purpose, am ready to meet gentlemen and discuss every proposition, and if anything is shown to be erroneous, I will myself offer an amendment to correct it.

But I shall not follow my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] or others who have preceded him in the discussion of the details of the bill, which properly come up as we reach the paragraphs under the five-minute rule. That is what that rule is for, and as the sections are read, if any gentleman has a criticism to make upon anything that is found in any paragraph, let him make it. Let him offer his amendment and I am ready to give the reasons of the members of the committee who favor the bill, why it should be sustained; and then it is for the Committee of the Whole and the House to determine whether they will have that provision or not. Well, I assert that from my examination of this measure, it contains no harsh provisions. If so, they have escaped my attention.

I do not claim to be the best lawyer in the country, but I am a lawyer of some experience, and in the last Congress the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], and myself spent the greater part of our mornings for two months in the examination of this bill and in perfecting amendments to it, most of which were adopted by the committee. The full committee originated some others and after three months' consideration reported to this House a substitute for the original Torrey bill, which I had opposed in the form in which it had been presented in the Fifty-first Congress. The substitute was free from the objectionable features of the original bill, which Mr. CULBERSON says was a Republican measure because it was introduced into the House by a Republican.

NOT A POLITICAL MEASURE.

Now, I wish to say a few words about the political aspect of this matter. I was astonished that my learned friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] should assert that this was a Republican measure or a political measure. I have never heard of a bankruptcy bill standing in that attitude heretofore. The great reputation of my friend ought to have led him to observe that in the past politics have had nothing to do with bankruptcy bills and ought never to have any.

This reference to the political aspect carries me beyond the few years that I have spent in this House. From my earliest connection with the Judiciary Committee, more than ten years ago, a bill upon the subject of bankruptcy has been before that committee; usually has been reported by a majority thereof to this House and considered, and on one occasion it was passed through this House. Sometimes the bill has been in charge of a Democrat and sometimes in charge of a Republican. That never seems to have entered into the question; and the members of the committee are divided always upon these measures, and so is the present committee, but not on party lines. Some of each party favor and some of each oppose the bill; not by their political faith, but by their peculiar views of the measure.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says the first bankruptcy bill was passed by Federalists. I will not undertake to discuss that, though one of the ablest commentators who lived in that day, Judge Story, declared that that was a good law, but that it was repealed before it was ever given a fair trial, so the country could not judge of its effect.

I will call attention to this fact, that at that day the condition of this country did not demand any such legislation as it does now. It was sparsely settled, and States greatly distant from New York and Massachusetts, for instance, were not connected as they are now by railroads, telegraphs, and telephones.

The States then, commercially as well as otherwise, were distinct and different communities, distant from each other. To-day, while every State has and ought forever to retain every right not delegated by it to the Union, yet Congress ought to exercise the power conferred by the Constitution to enact a bankruptcy law which will be a just and equitable uniform judicial regulation of commercial dealings throughout the Union. A mere voluntary law is one-sided, inequitable, and subject to great abuse.

This whole country has become one in a commercial way. These instrumentalities have connected the most remote States so that the space or distance between them is practically annihilated. They are brought near together and their commercial interests are such that, in my judgment, there ought to be one wise, judicious system extending to the whole of the forty-four States, the Territories and the District of Columbia rather than to have them judged by different systems of commercial law.

In 1841, when the bankruptcy bill was under discussion (it may be that I have read a little further than my friends on the other side of this question, who assert that it is a political measure), it was said by them that it was passed by the Whigs. It was not. The Whigs triumphed in the election of their candidate, who lived but a short time, when Mr. Tyler succeeded, became a Democrat and approved the bill.

VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

In the great debate which occurred upon the law of 1841 in the Senate, I have read what was said by the great lights of the time—Clay, Webster, Calhoun, and Benton. When my young friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] asserts that the substitute which he is going to offer for a system of voluntary bankruptcy is new, the gentleman betrays the fact that he has not read that great debate, or he would have found that Clay and Webster used all the power of their eloquence in favor of a bankruptcy law of a voluntary character merely, and that Calhoun spoke against any voluntary law, and declared that under the Constitution Congress had no power to pass any except an involuntary law; and that is in accordance with the holding of the judge in the case cited by the gentleman from Texas—the Missouri case.

Mr. Calhoun took that position on the ground that when the Constitution was framed authorizing Congress to enact a uniform system of bankruptcy, that it was in view of what was bankruptcy in Great Britain at that time, and which had extended to this country before the Revolution and freedom of the States from the rule of that country—and that was involuntary; while Mr. Benton, according to my recollection, favored the bill with both clauses in it; and what was the result? Notwithstanding the eloquence of Clay and Webster in favor of merely a voluntary law, they were overruled, and a law was passed with the involuntary clauses as well as voluntary clauses.

Why is it that every legislative body in this country that has ever passed upon the question has placed in the bill both kinds, voluntary and involuntary? It is because a sense of justice required them to do it, and because a purely voluntary law would ruin the credit of debtors. While we all sympathize with the poor debtors and want them to have a means of escape from the burden of debts that is crushing the life out of them, at the same time we can not turn a deaf ear to justice and turn our backs upon honest creditors, leaving them to be robbed of what they possess by dishonest schemers and give them no remedy whatever?

MR. STOCKDALE'S MISAPPREHENSIONS.

Another attack that was made, and furiously made, by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] on this bill was that in the first chapter of it there was a dictionary clause. I have heard that dropped out by some others as an objection, who have asserted that the bill was a wonderful product, and that this dictionary clause is ominous of the evil it contains. "Why look at the cussed thing; it has got a dictionary clause in it." I simply say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have here the code of his own State, and he will find in chapter 31 a definition of rules much more extensive than the dictionary clause of this bill. What has he to say to that? He is familiar with the code of his own State, I presume. Does he condemn it as a thing of evil because it has a "dictionary" chapter? I have here also the code of Alabama, in the first chapter of which is a dictionary of the definition of terms. This bill, in setting forth the definition of terms used in the bill, has but borrowed from well-digested codes of the States throughout the Union that which is necessary in order to make certain its language and to free it from difficulties of construction.

NOT "PATERNALISM."

Now, another feature that I wish to notice for a moment. My friend and distinguished colleague [Mr. DENSON], a good lawyer and an able speaker, saw proper to assail this as a measure of paternalism; and that was copied by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. Is it paternal? What is paternal-ism? The power which a State exercises is paternal, because all legislative powers not delegated to the Government of the United States by its Constitution nor reserved from the Legislature of the State is vested in the Legislature of the State to be exercised over the domestic affairs of the people. The State's powers are original and those of Congress are derivative.

The legislation of Congress is paternal only when it exceeds its powers and undertakes to regulate the domestic affairs of the people where you can find no grant of power in the Constitution to do such things. Read the Constitution of the United States, where it says Congress shall have the power to enact a uniform system of bankruptcy, and then say if this measure is paternal. It is nothing of the kind, and no one who fully understands the application of the word and wishes to be fair in argument will say that this bill is paternal.

Indeed, there is not a particle of paternalism in connection with it. It is a Constitutional measure, and the question first to be considered is whether our country is now in a condition requiring that such legislation should be enacted, and secondly whether the bill is a proper exercise of the power which we have beyond all question.

THE NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION CONCEDED.

My young friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] conceded, and most of the gentlemen who have been heard against the bill have conceded, that they would like to see some kind of bankruptcy legislation by this Congress, but generally they want it restricted to voluntary bankruptcy.

In other words, these gentlemen, overflowing with sympathy for the poor people, desire an instrumentality by which those people, both the honest and the dishonest, can be freed from all their obligations, while creditors must depend for the vindication of their rights upon the ordinary processes of law. Why, gentlemen, this bill is intended to be not for to-day or to-morrow, this year or the next, but a permanent enactment. Some have said, "Oh, you can not do that, because we have tried it three times, and every one of the bankruptcy laws heretofore passed was shortly afterwards repealed." And they attribute that result to the inability of Congress to enact a satisfactory law upon the subject. I maintain that some Congresses have sufficient ability among its members to do it, and it remains to be seen whether this one has. I have had occasion to look somewhat into the history of those laws.

Most of the gentlemen who oppose this bill say that it is in the interest of the creditor class and is intended to oppress the poor, which is not true. It is chiefly demanded by men who are at the same time debtors and creditors; it is also demanded by those who are only creditors or debtors. I have received private letters from numbers of gentlemen who would welcome the passage of such a law as a relief to them or to their friends; and I may remark that, as a general proposition, it is true that there are always more of the creditor class asking for bankruptcy legislation than of the debtor class. Another fact which some gentlemen here may not have thought of is this: every one of our bankruptcy laws was repealed either for false political reasons or at the instance, not of the debtor, but of the creditor class.

The act of 1867, which was passed, as has been stated, by a Republican Congress soon after the close of the war, was repealed at the instance of whom? Of the debtor class? Not so. You never heard of a debtor who had been discharged under that law who complained of it. Men were discharged under that law from the burdens of debt that hung over them, and which would have kept them ground down for the balance of their days. It was the creditors who complained, and they had a just right to complain. Especially in the Southern States had they that right, for it was in reconstruction times, and the Federal officials in many courts in those States, regardless of the provisions of the law, stole and appropriated to their own purposes the funds belonging to the estates of debtors which should have gone to the creditors.

The creditors in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities, mostly in the North, complained bitterly against the administration of the law in the Southern States, and it was repealed at their instance. My friend [Mr. DENSON] and myself, who were then practicing lawyers, know that in our State that law was badly administered, not against the debtor, for in some cases, through the officers of the courts, corrupt bargains were made with debtors who were thus allowed to retain more of their property than they ought to have had, and also obtain a discharge from their debts.

Mr. DENSON. And will my colleague state whether some of that, at least, was not done with the connivance of the judge?

Mr. OATES. I have no defense to make of that judge.

Mr. DENSON. Do you not know that he said that bankrupt court was never established for the benefit of creditors but simply to administer the estates of the debtors for the benefit of the officers of the court? [Laughter.]

Mr. OATES. Well, that was Dick Busteed, and everybody knows him. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that, fortunately for the country, the same state of affairs does not exist to-day. We have better men for judges and also for court officials generally, infinitely a better class of men than we had at that time. Throughout the Southern States—I wish to speak of them because my friends who are fighting this bill most strenuously are from the South—throughout the Southern States the judges are mixed in politics, and as a general rule, I believe, are honest men, without regard to their politics.

Alabama has one Democratic judge and one Republican; Georgia has one Democrat and one Republican. There is a vacancy now in Louisiana. Missouri has two Democratic judges. In South Carolina there is one Democratic judge, the only judge they have. In Texas there is one. In West Virginia there is one, the only judge they have. Then, in several of the Northern States there are Democratic judges. But among the Republican judges I know of none at this time such as we had when the last bankruptcy law was in force. Besides, under that law relatives of judges could be appointed to offices, which enabled them, if gentlemen will pardon the expression, to gobble up a large share of the estates that went into their custody. Under this bill the judge can not appoint as a court official anyone who is related to him within the third degree.

There are pains and penalties affixed in this bill to dishonest acts, and the compensation, except the filing fee, is not payable until the estate is administered. The court officials can not buy any of the property belonging to the estate of the bankrupt. All the avenues which they formerly traveled to robbery are closed by this bill.

MR. DENSON'S MISAPPREHENSIONS.

On the 24th of October last my honored colleague and friend [Mr. DENSON] said of this bill that it would reach all interests of this country of a financial or property character.

Sir, the gentleman has the reputation of being, as I said a while ago, a good lawyer, and I know he is; and how he could ever arrive at such an erroneous conclusion about the extent of the operation of this bill I am unable to see. Why, sir, its involuntary clauses can only be made to reach, if they should stand as they now are, two classes of people: those other than farmers and laborers who are insolvent and fail for a given time to pay their commercial paper, or being in such condition fail to release their property after thirty days when seized under legal process, and those who commit frauds upon their creditors. Sir, that class of business men and merchants who fail, according to the highest number given in statistical reports, have not in an average of thirteen years past reached 2 per cent. It is but a fair estimate that for the causes enumerated in the bill those subject to be proceeded against would be those who commit dishonest or fraudulent acts with reference to their creditors.

Well, sir, if a man is guilty of a fraud in fact, or a dishonest act, what is there in humanity which appeals to this Congress to shield him from the consequences of such act? According to the estimate of my colleague these cases must be so numerous as to reach perhaps 50 per cent of the population—a most egregious error in calculation.

Mr. DENSON. My colleague will allow me to state that my argument was based upon the remote effect which the bill would have upon the farmers, because of their indebtedness to these local merchants.

Mr. OATES. I am not through with the statement.

Mr. DENSON. And I can not see how it could be otherwise than oppressive to them in their present condition.

Mr. OATES. This measure would not reach 5 per cent of the people of my colleague's district, although he says it would ruin all of them. I think it would benefit them.

Then as to persons of the debtor class who may voluntarily apply for the benefits of this law, if, as the gentleman contends, this bill is to reach and affect all the interests of the country, that class must be equal to 50 per cent of the population. If they are all in debt and unable to pay, and all the property of the country is to come under the control of this bill——

Mr. DENSON. I will ask my colleague how he gets at the fact that only 5 per cent of my constituents would be involved?

Mr. OATES. That is my argument. I judge by past experience and all reasonable calculation.

Mr. DENSON. I say that 95 per cent of them would be.

Mr. OATES. I know; that is the difference between us upon the facts. I do not see how anyone can rationally arrive at such a conclusion as my colleague has reached.

Mr. DENSON. I only wish the gentleman were right.

Mr. OATES. My colleague undertook to show, and did show by his assertions, that his constituents are in a terrible condition, covered with loads of indebtedness which they are utterly unable to pay—involved to such an extent that the passage of this bill would deprive them of their homes and all the other property they possess. Why, sir, there never was a greater mistake. This bill embodies provisions for the relief of honest people who are overburdened with debt, as my colleague pictures his constituents to be; and I do not see how any lawyer of his reputation can, upon a fair examination of its provisions, deny that it would bring to such people the relief which they so much need from their burdens. It was not under this law that they sank to the level where he represents them as being. They got there under the State laws; and he seems to oppose any law by Congress for their relief unless it be a law for the free coinage of silver.

Mr. DENSON. I certainly contend for the free coinage of silver.

Mr. OATES. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DENSON. And inasmuch as silver has been demonetized, in part by your vote, I think you ought to relieve us now on this bankruptcy question and give us a fair chance.

Mr. OATES. I shall have something to say about that a little further on. I deny that my vote aided in demonetizing silver. It is not demonetized.

The gentleman opposes this measure because he says it tends to paternalism. There is no paternalism in it. For my part, I think he greatly overestimates the financial embarrassments of his people; but if his view be true, this bankruptcy bill which he so vehemently denounces (as I think, without justification in fact or logic) is the measure needed to give them relief. It would be to them a white-winged messenger of peace rather than an engine of oppression. It would give to the honest insolvents an honorable discharge from the mountain of debt which is now, according to my colleague's statement (much of which is doubtless true), crushing the life out of them. It would give to every man in his district a more extended credit than he can now secure, and thereby give an impetus to trade, develop an individual prosperity——

Mr. DENSON. If my colleague will pardon me, I would like to ask him this question: After the debtor has had all his property taken under the involuntary clauses of this bill——

Mr. OATES. I am coming to that.

Mr. DENSON. You say he may protect himself by voluntary bankruptcy. How would he have any money with which to start proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy?

Mr. OATES. The gentleman anticipates my argument a little.

Mr. DENSON. You put the vultures upon him, and then you abandon him; you do not give him a decent burial.

Mr. OATES. I will come to that a little further on.

It would give to every man in his district a more extended credit than he can now secure, and thereby give an impetus to trade development and individual prosperity. But in his conception there is no way for them to be relieved—nor for any other people overburdened with loads of debt in this country—except by the enactment of a law for the free coinage of silver. What infatuation is it that blinds him to the true interests of his constituents? I would gladly join him in the enactment of a law for the free coinage of silver at a parity ratio. But if a law for free coinage existed, the gentleman did not inform us and his constituents how that silver money would ever reach their pockets. The Government does not make free gifts of the silver coined at its mints. It is paid out only in exchange for equivalents, and if their condition is as bad as represented they have nothing to give in exchange for it.

Mr. DENSON. I will tell my colleague how the silver will reach their pockets. If you will increase the metallic circulation of the country, the price of all products being controlled by the amount of money in circulation—gold and silver—the prices of cotton will be increased, the prices of what our farmers raise will be increased, and their day's labor will bring a better price. Increase the volume of currency in this country and they will get a larger price for all the products that they have to sell and for their labor than they do now. In that way the money will go into their pockets.

Mr. OATES. That argument is true if the money of the country is sufficiently inflated, but, like a bubble, will burst if raised too high.

This bill is intended to allow his constituents and mine, weighed down with burdens of debt more than they can pay, and hence doomed to labor from year's end to year's end to pay the interest on what they owe and obtain indulgence from their money masters to whom they are indebted, and relief from that species of slavery. He would allow the country merchant who has obtained the goods of some wholesale dealer by fraud or upon a misrepresentation of his financial condition and ability to pay, which he does not intend to do, to sell the same to his poor constituents for waiver notes or mortgages upon their homes and crops, and thus to hold them in perpetual bondage while he dictates his own terms of payment to the man whose goods he has sold to the poor farmers and virtually deprived them of their liberties and all prospect of future prosperity. And such acts on the part of some merchants cause honest ones and their customers to have to pay higher for the goods they buy. It makes honest men pay for the rascality of others. How can it be prevented except by a well-considered bankruptcy law having uniformity of operation throughout the Union?

Mr. DENSON. How is the farmer to get into this court?

Mr. OATES. I will stop just here to answer that question. If the farmer has got nothing to surrender it is but a very small fee that he must pay in order to avail himself of the benefit of the law.

Mr. DENSON. Ah, but after you have dispossessed him of his homestead, what has he got? You know very well that no man gets credit now amongst the farming community in our part of the country, unless he waives his homestead right and mortgages even his knives and forks and spoons to the merchant. Now, if you have taken everything and he has not any money left him even to buy a winding sheet, how is he going to get into that bankrupt court?

Suppose a creditor here desires to give him a little better chance, to give him time until a Democratic House can get here and remonetize silver—and the people of the country, I tell you, will assert their right some time, and send men here who will do that, and in the near future—but if the creditors are willing to extend the time until we get silver in circulation as money, then we will get higher prices for our products and better rates for our labor, then the farmers will reap the benefit in that way, why prevent them?

Mr. OATES. My friend thinks this is not a Democratic House?

Mr. DENSON. Not on the money question, I assert most positively.

Mr. REED. Or any other. [Laughter.]

Mr. OATES. Well, I will accept my friend's statement, especially as it is backed up by the testimony of the gentleman from Maine. He is a good judge of Democracy (?) I am sure. If you will read subdivision (2) of Sec. 51*a* you will see that although a man has no money he can secure the benefits of the act. But I wish to request my colleague, and I do it most respectfully, as I am limited in time, to make his interruptions as brief as possible.

Mr. DENSON. I beg my colleague's pardon. I did not know that his time was limited.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman seems to think that because no bankruptcy law hitherto enacted by Congress has proven satisfactory to the country it is an impossibility to enact one that will, which is a fallacy. He said that the law of 1841 was approved by a President elected by the Whigs, but who went astray and abandoned his party. That President, Mr. Tyler, in the estimation of my colleague went astray when he abandoned the Whig party and joined the party to which my colleague and myself belong. It seems to me that it was one of the most virtuous political moves the President could have made. And the last bankruptcy law which was enacted by a Republican Congress was likewise repealed by a Republican Congress. The dishonest administration of that law during the period of reconstruction in the South, particularly in our State, was, I presume, what created in the mind of my colleague such a bitter prejudice against all bankruptcy legislation.

I bear willing witness with him to many of the flagrant outrages perpetrated upon the people in the administration of that law, but all of the outrages, be it remembered, were upon the creditors and not upon the rights of debtors. What right have we, then, here to set up the complaint and the denunciation of this proposed legislation on the ground that it is going to oppress the debtor? Why, the wrongs that have been perpetrated by bankruptcy laws have always been heretofore on the creditor classes.

That law came to us just after the close of the civil war; with the changed condition of the people, the labor system having been revolutionized, and though badly administered as to creditors, it relieved many unfortunate debtors of loads of debt which they never could have paid by their honest toil, and allowed them to enter again the highway of progress and prosperity. But in the mind of my colleague there remains only recollections of the evils wrought by the law, and he seems to have forgotten that much good was accomplished by it, to just such people as those he now claims would be ruined by this law. He seems to think that this bill would take the place in rascality of the other's administration, and would but duplicate upon our people all the wrongs which were done in the administration of that measure, forgetting that these wrongs were to the creditor class, whom he denounces as would-be tyrants and oppressors under this bill.

Why, sir, this bill is infinitely superior to that of 1867, and we have a different set of officials to administer it. They are generally much better men and with less opportunity to do wrong. I have already referred to the list of judges.

Then my colleague [Mr. DENSON] made another assault upon this bill, saying:

These debts are due mostly to the local merchants and secured by mortgages upon the homesteads of the debtors, and notes waiving all exemptions of personal property subject to payment of debts.

Thus it is at once discovered that my constituency are at the mercy of the creditor, his home is in peril, and the personal effects necessary to secure a livelihood are jeopardized.

I admit that the farmer, the agriculturist, and the wage-earner are not embraced in the involuntary clause of this bill, but this does not relieve them from its baneful effects. They are in a painful degree subjected to its merciless ravages, and are made the defenseless victims of an expensive, and, in my district, of an alien and partisan court.

They being the debtors of the local merchants, who are subject to the provisions of this bill, their homes and personal effects will be at once exposed to forced sale, amid the dearth, stringency, and contraction of money, the medium of exchange, and standard of value.

Mr. DENSON. How do you propose under a bankrupt law to administer their exemptions when they have waived them?

Mr. OATES. I will come to that before I take my seat. In the gentleman's characterization of the court which would have the administration of this bill, should it become a law, over such of his constituents as became interested therein, he said that they would be the "victims of an alien and partisan court." This is inconsistent with the estimate which he placed upon the judge on a former occasion. Judge Bruce is the judge of the Federal court referred to. In the investigation of alleged abuses of power by judges and court officials made by the special subcommittee of the Judiciary in the Fifty-first Congress, it fell to my lot to take the testimony of my colleague, who was at that time United States district attorney over the same territory in which his district now lies, and he testified in regard to Judge Bruce as follows:

Q. What is your opinion of Judge Bruce as a judge?

A. I can give it. Judge Bruce is a man of cultured intellect. He only practiced law five years, so he informed me, when he quit and never went back to the practice until he was appointed district judge by President Grant. With the improvement that I discovered in the four years that I was with him, and his manner of trying cases in the court, he was on a par with any of the State judges (circuit) in Alabama; his legal ability was on a par with them. While I served under him as district attorney I never discovered in him any disposition to be oppressive to anyone. Bruce is a very sympathetic man. I considered him a very conscientious man in the discharge of his duties as judge. I have seen many abler men on the bench than Judge Bruce. I know abler men as judges than Judge Bruce, but take him all in all he is just such a judge as I say ranks with the judges of the State circuit court. Judge Bruce is of a mild and gentle nature, very sympathetic, indeed, and it is hard for him to say "no." If he committed any errors in these matters it was on the side of mercy, and not to disregard the law or shirk his duties.

Mr. DENSON. Now, will my colleague permit a question here?

Mr. OATES. In just a moment. The difference in my friend's statement is that he was swearing then, and when he made his speech here recently he was simply talking. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENSON. Now, let me ask a question? Are you not making a speech yourself?

Mr. OATES. Yes.

Mr. DENSON. And did you not cuss Judge Bruce all over Alabama, and did you not fail to speak to him on account of his decision in a bank case against you?

Mr. OATES. No; I never refused to speak to him, but I did use some un-Christian expressions about him. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENSON. Was it not on account of his decision against you in that case?

Mr. OATES. Yes; and I thought his ruling was wrong. I thought it so strongly that I appealed the case to the United States Supreme Court, and that court decided against me and sustained Judge Bruce.

Mr. DENSON. Then you were wrong?

Mr. OATES. It seems so, but I have always thought the decision wrong and still think so.

Mr. DENSON. I was not wrong in saying Judge Bruce was a Christian gentleman and a very good lawyer. I here reiterate all my testimony in regard to him.

Mr. OATES. You were swearing then, but here you were simply making a speech and did not think so well of him.

Mr. DENSON. I was swearing then, and I am speaking now. The difference between me and my friend is that his was a personal interest and mine was for the general welfare. I stand by the general welfare. He was aroused by his personal feeling. As to that examination about Judge Bruce, I would like to ask my colleague this question: Which was true, what I stated in the speech or what I stated in the examination?

Mr. OATES. I think what you stated in the examination was true. You swore to it and I have no right to doubt it.

Mr. DENSON. Perhaps the virtue of my testimony originated in the fact that my friend administered the oath to me.

Mr. OATES. I always believe you when under oath. I would like to believe you all the time, but when you get to speaking you get warmed up above your subject.

Mr. DENSON. That is just the reason people will not believe you in your speech here. You are simply speaking now.

Mr. OATES. That may be, but still I am not affected as much as the gentleman was by the refusal of the House to adopt the free coinage of silver.

Mr. DENSON. There may be a refusal here, but there will not be in Alabama, which my friend will find out, if he does not mind.

Mr. OATES. I am in favor of free coinage just as much as you are, only I differ as to the ratio. I propose that when the dollar is coined it shall be a dollar—a good dollar.

Mr. DENSON. Did not you vote for the restoration of the Bland-Allison act here in August?

Mr. OATES. I did.

Mr. DENSON. Was not that at a ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. OATES. It was, but the coinage was limited, and it was the only chance I then saw for any coinage of silver.

Mr. DENSON. Was it not limited in the Sherman bill, too?

Mr. OATES. Not at all, except in the amount purchased; not in the coinage.

Mr. DENSON. Of course; how could you coin more than you purchased?

Mr. OATES. It could not be done. The mints have not sufficient capacity to coin it as fast as purchased, and that law was condemned by our platform. It would seem, upon a fair construction, that my colleague thinks Judge Bruce quite as fair, as impartial, and as able to administer this law as would be any judge of the courts of our State. As to Judge Bruce's kindness of heart and capacity, I could read from a letter of Mr. Roulhac, a prominent Democratic lawyer who practices in his court, and the testimony of ex-Supreme Court Judge R. W. Walker, but deem it unnecessary.

SUPPORTED BY CHIEF-JUSTICE STONE.

I wish to say at this point, although it be a slight departure from the gentleman's language upon which I am commenting, that the most distinguished judge in our State, George W. Stone, the chief justice of the supreme court, who but recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his services as a judge, and who is universally respected in the State, and acknowledged to be the head of our judiciary, has corresponded with me for years upon the subject of this bill, and made several useful suggestions of amendment which are now incorporated in it, and I take great pride in saying as the bill now stands it meets his hearty approval. I think that his legal opinion is certainly as weighty as that of my distinguished colleague or that of either of the gentlemen from Texas.

The chief justice said:

In the present condition of the country and the commercial habits of the people, I consider a national bankruptcy law a great and pressing want, because the giving of fraudulent preferences by failing debtors has become so frequent as almost to bring discredit upon commercial pursuits. I want a bankruptcy law in order to put a check to that very prevalent habit of giving what I conceive to be improper, if not fraudulent, preferences.

Concerning this bill Judge Stone Says:

I have conferred with Col. OATES upon the subject of that measure, and am familiar with it as at present perfected. In the great elements of simplicity, inexpensiveness, and expediency of administration, checks and guards against frauds and oppression in its execution, I consider it almost incalculably superior to any bankruptcy bill that has ever been enacted in the United States or presented to Congress for its consideration.

Mr. DENSON. Is it a question of legal opinion or one of proper and legitimate legislation? The gentleman knows that a very fine lawyer may be a very poor legislator.

Mr. OATES. That is true; but a legal opinion is necessary in order to fully understand this bill, and my colleague as a lawyer has failed to properly understand it.

A COMPLETE LAW DEMANDED.

All the commercial bodies in Alabama have declared in favor of this identical bill. I have here the resolutions of the Mobile Cotton Exchange, the Mobile Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial and Industrial Association of Montgomery, and others. I also have hundreds of letters from citizens of my own and of other States of the Union, and of nearly every class and condition favoring this bill. Among them I have just received the following telegram from Dallas, Tex.:

DALLAS, TEX., December 7, 1893.

Hon. WILLIAM C. OATES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

The business men of Texas want equal justice to creditor and debtor, and favor the involuntary as well as voluntary features of bankrupt bill. We regard a purely voluntary bill as unjust, unfair, and unmanly, and hope Congress will take favorable action on pending bill.

A. T. Watts Armstrong Company, wholesale grocers; Dallas Packing Company; J. T. Trezevant, L. R. Andrews, Thos. Scurry, Chas. Fred Tucker, The J. W. Crowdus Drug Company; Howell Bros. Shoe Company, by S. J. Howell, president; W. J. Bellertin; J. Q. Armstrong, president State National Bank, and many others; Thos. Field.

MR. DENSON'S FURTHER MISAPPREHENSIONS.

But my colleague said that as his farmer constituents, engaged chiefly in the very honorable avocation of producing cotton, were the debtors of local merchants, who held against them their promissory notes, waiving the right to claim their property as exempt, and mortgages upon their homesteads, would, under the operations of this bill, be deprived of their homes and their substance, as they would be utterly unable to pay their debts in view of the contraction of the money medium of exchange and the standard of value.

Sir, while there is, I know, an unequal distribution of the money in circulation, owing to a wrong in our general financial system—which certainly ought to be corrected by this Congress—the gentleman's assertion of the contraction of the circulation is not true as to the amount of money. The circulation is now over $25 per capita, larger than it has been in the last twenty years; but still I, as well as my colleague, wish it increased for the reason that I do not think our people can have too much good money, and there is in fact a great scarcity of circulation in our section of the country.

But I want no fiat money. I want money, every dollar of which is the equal of every other, and, like my colleague, I would not object to having a large part of that in silver. But there is nothing in this bill to interfere with that. The failure of free coinage is a reason why this bill ought to pass, so as to benefit his and my poor constituents who are in debt more than they can pay. He assumes that, because under our laws and the practice in our State the farmers frequently give mortgages to the local merchants upon their homes, and notes waiving the right of exemption as to their personal property, that in case the local merchant is adjudged a bankrupt all these papers will pass to the trustee appointed by the creditors, who will enforce the notes and foreclose the mortgages and at once expose for sale the homes of the mortgagors and their personal effects for the purpose of paying the debts of the bankrupt local merchant. They could not be inconvenienced except by enforcing their own contracts after their maturity. Why, sir, nothing but a stay law for forty years or the free coinage of silver could satisfy him that the country is safe!

Mr. DENSON. I ask my colleague if the sentiment of Alabama is not for the free coinage of silver?

Mr. OATES. Oh, yes; it is; and I am in favor of the free coinage of silver. I am only referring to what I believe would satisfy my colleague.

Mr. DENSON. I never said anything about "nothing would satisfy me but the free coinage of silver."

Mr. OATES. That I said by way of comment on your wonderful speech.

Mr. DENSON. Oh; you are just making a speech, and not swearing at all.

Mr. OATES. Oh, no. I am not under oath, but I am trying to get at the truth. Let us look at the bill and see whether this conclusion is strictly correct.

Section 5 reads as follows:

This act shall not affect the allowance to the bankrupts of the exemptions which are prescribed by the State laws in force at the time of the filing of the petition in the State wherein the adjudication is made.

The intention of this is in all cases to leave with the bankrupt all his property exempted from sale under execution by the law of the State of his residence. My colleague indulged in a criticism upon the language of this section to show that in States other than the residence of the bankrupt he might be adjudged such and by that law entitled to no exemption.

Sir, in order to put this beyond cavil, and to carry out the real meaning of the section, I propose to amend it so as to say "in the State wherein the bankrupt resides at the time of the adjudication." That will make it clear.

Now, I admit that there is much force in what my colleague said with reference to mortgages upon homesteads, and notes waiving the right of exemption, falling into the hands of the trustee of the bankrupt creditor of people thus unfortunately in debt; but where people have seen proper to waive their right of exemption, or give mortgages upon their homes for the purpose of obtaining credit and means with which to conduct their farms, it is in each case a voluntary action on their part, caused in some cases, I admit, by necessity.

Poor laboring people in such condition have my sincere sympathy, but are we a people, and have we governments of law which recognize the right of every competent person to contract and to enter into such obligations as he sees proper to make? My colleague speaks as though the law should never be enforced for the collection of any debt contracted by a poor person, nor should any mortgage ever be foreclosed upon the homestead or other property of a poor laboring man, nor should any note which he has seen proper to give waiving the right of exemption of his personal property, be enforced through the courts of the country.

Mr. DENSON. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question right there? In view of the President's message, in which he says that we should take time to see what the effect of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act will be, I ask him that the consideration of this bill be postponed until we do see. The price of everything has gone down since the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, and perhaps they do not know everything about the bankruptcy, just as they did not know everything about silver, although they professed to know.

Mr. OATES. I have not heard of the fall in prices, but I ask my colleague to withhold his commentary until we come to the discussion of the time at which this bill is to go into effect. He made his speech heretofore. It is my time now.

Mr. DENSON. I know it is after six months.

Mr. OATES. But you can move to amend it and make the time such as you desire, if the House will agree to it.

Mr. DENSON. But I do not want to have anything to do with it. I do not want to be in bad company.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman then ought to avoid it. He speaks as though all of the country merchants would be doomed under this law to be adjudged bankrupts. Such a conclusion is certainly not justified and is in no way complimentary to the country merchants. It would be a very large calculation, sir, to suppose that 5 per cent of these would be adjudged bankrupts. My colleague seems to forget or purposely ignores the fact that whenever a petition is filed alleging that such a merchant or dealer is a bankrupt that the question of insolvency, as well as the question of the failure to pay his debts, would have to be determined by a jury of his peers if he demanded it.

MR. CULBERSON AND THE JURY SYSTEM.

But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] ridicules the idea of obtaining a fair and impartial jury. If that can not now be done, why does not the gentleman employ his great talents and a part of his valuable time in providing for a better jury system rather than in ridiculing the one we have? He is the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I make this suggestion that the gentleman proceed to adopt a plan or bring into this House a recommendation for the improvement of the jury system, if in fact it be half as bad as he represents it. I am a believer in the fairness and honesty of jurors and I think that as a general rule the Federal district judges are as honest and competent as the judges of the State courts. If there is anything wrong in the Federal judicial system—judges or jurors—I will join the gentleman from Texas in an effort to correct and purify it. Remember that the laboring oar is now in the hands of our party and the Democracy is responsible for the conduct of the Government now.

To determine the question of insolvency no such rule as they contend for would be applied to the language of the bill. If the defendant's property, at a "fair valuation," would be insufficient to pay his debts, then the jury would have to determine that he was insolvent. My colleague and the gentleman from Texas contend that a "fair valuation" would be only what it would sell for at public outcry, which would not be the rule. The question would be what was the defendant's property worth "at a fair valuation" at the time the petition was filed? The jury would arrive at the valuation like appraisers of the property of decedents find the valuation, which is according to what they think it is fairly worth.

It is what they believe on oath the property is really worth, and not what it might sell for under the hammer in times of depression; and, sir, when the jury were thus passing upon the alleged insolvency of the country merchant, or defendant, whoever he might be, all of the mortgages and waiver notes belonging to him would be estimated by the jury at their face value, if the makers thereof had property for their satisfaction, so that, including these, at a fair valuation of all of the assets of the alleged bankrupt's estate he was found to have enough property to pay his debts, the petition would be dismissed and he would be triumphant, and the petitioners would be mulcted in the cost. But both my colleague and the gentleman from Texas insist that he would be a ruined man in reputation, although he was successful, simply because his creditor had made a false charge against him.

Indeed a new phase as to the effects of litigation. By the same reasoning a person who is sued for slander is forever disgraced, though he gain the suit. The question of his insolvency would not be running through every minute of time of the thirty days, as alleged by my gifted colleague, but it would be his actual condition on the day and hour of the filing of the petition. According to all rules of pleading that would be the issue. Is there any reputable lawyer who will dispute the proposition? If he had been insolvent the week before, and on that day "at a fair valuation" of his property—not what it would sell for under the hammer—he was found to be solvent, the petition would necessarily have to be dismissed. The question for decision would be, was he insolvent when the petition was filed? The court would not inquire into his condition at any other time. It would be foreign to the issue.

"THE HAMMER OF THE SHERIFF."

The gentleman said that one of the clauses of the Democratic platform is "to stop the hammer of the sheriff on the mortgages of the people," and he said that—

This bill, originated in a Democratic House, from a Democratic source, is inaugurating the crucial performance of the sheriff's hammer, with silver demonetized and destroyed.

Sir, I never heard of any platform, unless it possibly may have been one adopted by the Populists, which declared the foreclosure of mortgages to be unlawful. I have never heard of one before which declared the foreclosure of mortgages past due to be an unlawful and outrageous act. I have never heard of a political party which declared against "the sheriff's hammer" in execution of the legal processes of the courts on the foreclosure of a mortgage; and if there be any political party which declares against the foreclosure of honest mortgages past due, or coercing the payment of honest debts contracted for a fair consideration within a reasonable time after they fall due, I would like to know it, and I certainly will not belong to such dishonest organization.

Mr. PENCE. You remember, do you not, that the Democratic platform denounced the sheriff industry on account of its extent?

Mr. OATES. I do not, and I do not believe you can find it therein. I am a Democrat on principles which are always consistent with honesty. I have been a member of the Legislature of my State, and my record there will show—as it will here—that I have ever been the friend of the farmers and the poor laboring men of the country, and have done whatever I could by legislation for their benefit; but I do not propose any dishonest methods of relief to them, nor do any of my constituents desire that I should.

I have always regarded the wealthy as more capable of taking care of themselves than the poor, and hence I have in legislation watched the interests of the latter more than the former; but God forbid that I shall ever lend my energies to the enactment of any unjust law to deprive the creditor class of their rights because they are supposed to be owners of property. I would no sooner sanction the enactment of such laws than I would sanction one for the oppression of the poor or to enable the wealthy to impose upon or to oppress them, and that I will never do while reason and justice hold a place in my brain.

The gentleman says that the Torrey bankruptcy bill is "the most crushing and damnable instrumentality to oppress farmers, laborers, debtors, and small dealers of his section that the avaricious greed and soulless cupidity of a Shylock could suggest." This is but asseveration, and not a particle of proof has been submitted to sustain it. My colleague said:

"The bill is offered for all the pledges and promises of financial relief and aid made to his people."

And then, when I asked him the question as to whether he charged me with bringing forward this bill in lieu of all the pledges made to the people at the last election, he replied:

I do not intend to make any charge against members of this House in my remarks upon this bill. * * * I acquit my colleague [Mr. OATES] of all partnership, of all connection with this bill outside of his legislative duty.

This I expected from our long and uniform personal and political friendship, but if the bill is such a diabolical monstrosity as he characterizes it it is no compliment to my intelligence to be its advocate.

And when he sanctioned Mr. SIBLEY'S summing up of his argument—

That the silver legislation is the seed which was sown to produce this great crop of ruin, and this bankrupt bill follows as a harvester, a thresher to enable Shylock to gather in his crop—

I knew that he was making a heavy draft upon the code of the Populists.

I asked him if it could be true that this was offered to the Democracy in fulfillment of all our Democratic financial promises during the last campaign, when the present bill, in one form or another, had been before Congress, considered and acted upon for the last six years? My colleague replied:

I say again I do not want my colleague [Mr. OATES] to think that I am impugning him in any way. I exonerate him entirely. I know him too well not to know that he would never engage in the oppression of any man in Alabama or anywhere else.

I thanked him for the compliment, though indeed it was a doubtful one when he adopted the simile of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. While he acquitted me of any purpose to do wrong, what he said was an implied charge of ignorance on my part, and makes me guilty of a double political crime by advocating this bill and voting for "the Voorhees repeal bill passed in this House, which is the sum total of all the iniquities and crimes perpetrated against the people."

Mr. Chairman, that is a measure for which I voted, and I claim that in that vote I exhibited as much intelligence and patriotism as my distinguished colleague did in voting against it, notwithstanding I concede he is a gentleman who usually displays a high order of intelligence. The platform of my party demanded the repeal of the Sherman law, and in obedience to that pledge I voted for the repeal bill.

A large majority in this House and in that of the other end of the Capitol seem to have been in accord with me rather than with my colleague upon that subject. I, sir, am capable of differing with any gentleman upon this floor without arraigning him or calling in question his intelligence or patriotism. I can differ with him, as I do with my colleague, and still believe that he is as honest as I am whether he reciprocates that courtesy or not.

MR. DENSON AGAIN.

My esteemed colleague further said:

Mr. Chairman, this bankrupt bill is but another cruel and destructive instrumentality employed by the demon Money to crush out the farmers, the laborers, and the masses of the country, and make them subservient and obedient slaves to the privileged classes, the capitalists and money power of this land.

This is a revelation to me. I never heard before that there were any privileged classes in this country.

Sir, I deny the correctness of that conclusion. It originated in the fertile imagination of my friend, or he borrowed it from some of our calamity paraders. It has no existence in fact, and must have been born of an overwrought imagination or it never would have found utterance by a good Democrat.

The purpose of the bill is, and the effect of it as a law would be, infinitely more for the release of debtors from their obligations than to enable creditors to collect their debts. A greater number of debtors than creditors would be benefited thereby, though the bill is a just and equitable measure to both classes. All three of the bankruptcy laws enacted in this country were enacted largely at the instance of the creditor class and repealed at their instance, and not on the complaint of the debtors. Then what ground remains for the assertion that this would be a law merely for the collection of debts?

He also said:

I here raise my voice against this infernal engine of ruin, slavery, and destruction to the masses. I look upon it, in connection with the financial system now established and administered in this Union, as the last stroke necessary to destroy free institutions and drive home the last screw in the coffin of liberty.

"O liberty, what crimes have been committed in thy name!" said Madame Roland at the guillotine.

I agree that the financial system is not a good one, and is sadly in need of decided change and improvement, which I am doing all I can by proper means to remedy. But, sir, if I believed all this which my colleague asserts to be just as he states it, I would, in a spirit of patriotism and love of my fellow-men, including his constituents as well as my own—notwithstanding I am on the sunset side of life and my body maimed—again take up arms and incur whatever danger there might be to life and limb in defense of my people against such tyranny as he alleges; nor would I acquit or hold blameless any man who would advocate such a diabolical measure as he describes, except upon the plea of idiocy.

My friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is nearly as extreme in denunciation and misrepresentation of the bill as my esteemed colleague, but not quite so vituperative; in that my colleague excels. He, too, is wild upon the subject of free coinage as well as upon bankruptcy legislation. I am unable to discover any relation between the two subjects. It seems to me that only a disordered imagination can suppose them to be parts of the same thing or to have any connection with each other.

Why, sir, my colleague characterized this bill as "the consummation of a revolution by which the liberties of the people would be forever destroyed," and said that no people ever lost their independence who owned their homes; that a land owner was never known to become a slave or dependent so long as he could retain the unincumbered ownership and peaceful possession of his land.

Well, does anyone doubt this; is there anything in the bill contrary to that doctrine? But he complained that many of his constituents owned incumbered homes; that they were incumbered by mortgages. Well, who gave the mortgages? Would he, in order to make each of them a free man, take away from him the right to give a mortgage upon his home whenever he sees proper to do so? Would he take away from the owner of the property the right of disposition or to incumber it? If so the owner would cease to be free whenever the disposal of his own property was taken away from him. That would be paternalism of the strongest character.

Yet such is the course of his logic. Are not the poor people of his district and mine free men, who have the right to sell or mortgage their homesteads if they wish? Would he deprive them of this right? If so, he would deny to them the liberty which I concede to exist in them and for which I will ever contend. I want this bill passed for their benefit.

He says, in criticism of the bill, that the "trustee sets apart the bankrupt s exemptions and reports the items and estimated value there of to the court," which is by no means all, but only a part of the proceedings in that connection. He claims that the bankrupt court determines all claims of exemption, and then says:

> These provisions of the bill are unconstitutional because the amounts involved are of more than $20 in value, and that there is no provision made to try the same by a jury.

When the bill, in section 6, line 22, says that the bankrupt in his schedule shall file a claim for "such exemptions as he may be entitled to," and subdivision c of section 19 declares that "the right to submit matters in controversy or an alleged offense under this act to a jury shall be determined and enjoyed according to the United States laws now in force upon that subject, or such as may be hereafter enacted, except as herein provided," thereby giving a trial by jury upon the value of the exempted property in event there should be a controversy in relation thereto, and overturning completely the gentleman's point of unconstitutionality.

Remember, that a law that is not perfectly clear and overwhelming in its demand for the right of jury trial, if at all susceptible of such construction, will be so construed by the courts as to make it in harmony with the Constitution of the country. If there are simply doubts about whether the law gives the right to a trial by jury, when it is a matter in which the Constitution requires a trial by jury, the courts would so construe the statute as to give it, and thus sustain its constitutionality.

And if this is not broad enough, construed in the light of the Constitution to secure it, we can amend it and make it so. He seems to forget that this bill is amendable if any part of it is shown to be wrong.

They claim that this bill would be an engine of oppression placed in the hands of the creditor class to put debtors and their property under the control of the creditor, and that "this is but another means, another instrumentality, to be set on foot in connection with the demonetization of silver to put the property and personal liberty of the citizen under control and direction of the money and creditor classes."

Silver has not been demonetized since 1878. It is to-day a legal tender in payment of debts, as much so as gold. If the 10 per cent tax were repealed, so that we could have good State-bank bills, we would be very well satisfied, as we will have about $700,000,000 of silver anyway; but my colleague—I say it respectfully—seems to be as much enamored of free silver as was Master Slender with the beauties of sweet Ann Page.

Why, sir, this bill is nothing of the kind. It never was a conspirator against silver. A bill on the subject of bankruptcy in one form or another has been before the Judiciary Committee and the House of Representatives for the last ten years. The first was the Lowell bill, which Pat Collins, a great Democrat, had charge of, and the question of such a law has all the time been advocated by some of the ablest members of this House, while others have honestly opposed it, without division on party lines. At the present time some Democrats and some Republicans and Populists are in favor of this bill and some opposed to it. It is not a party measure at all.

The bill at the present time is in the mildest and most humane form that a bankruptcy bill was ever presented to the American Congress. I make this assertion notwithstanding the bitter denunciations of it by my colleague and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. And as to the demonetization of silver, no law of the kind has passed or is likely to pass, according to my understanding of that term. Silver was demonetized in 1873 when it was deprived of its legal-tender quality, but that was restored in 1878 and still remains. Refusing to coin it would be wrong, but would neither demonetize nor destroy it. My colleague speaks of it not only as being demonetized, but destroyed.

Why, sir, the repeal bill renews the declaration of the law that the silver dollar is a legal tender in the payment of debts, and declares that it shall so remain. I am, sir, in favor of the free coinage of silver on a parity with gold; but that subject is altogether foreign to the present one. Yet my colleague declared that the legislation then about to be consummated not only demonetized, but destroyed silver.

Another of his criticisms of the bill: When speaking of the exemptions which he alleged were to be tried alone by the bankruptcy court without a jury, he used the following language:

> In Alabama a debtor has got to file a statement of his liabilities and of his assets to be entitled to exemptions.

That is not correct. But he says:

> Under the laws of Alabama a debtor desiring to claim the benefit of the exemption laws may at any time file his written declaration in the probate court asking such exemptions to be allowed him. Of course this amounts to a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

That is the language of the bill—

Said he—> and if he makes a declaration of that kind on the records of the country or anywhere else, that is, that he is unable to pay his debts, he can be petitioned into bankruptcy.

Mr. Chairman, to show how utterly erroneous this statement is, I quote from section 2 of the bill. The ground of involuntary bankruptcy which my colleague was referring to is as follows:

> Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

Now, sir, by the statute law of Alabama, section 2515 of the code, it is declared that—

> Any resident of this State entitled to and desiring to claim a homestead or other exemption from levy and sale under execution or other process may at any time make and file in the office of the judge of probate in the county in which the property is situated, if a homestead, or if personal property, of the county in which such resident resides, a declaration in writing, subscribed and sworn to by him, describing the property selected and claimed by him as exempt, item by item, in case of personal property, with its value; and other declarations may from time to time, as occasion may require, be made and filed.

Defendant is not required to say one word about his inability to pay his debts; no, sir. A man may claim whatever property is allowed him by law from the payment of his debts, even when he has other property that is likewise subject. It is also provided by statute that the failure to file such exemption is no waiver of the right of the defendant in execution to claim it; and here, sir, my learned colleague claims that the filing in a probate court of a statutory declaration that the property of the defendant is claimed as exempt from sale for his debts is the equivalent of the fourth ground of involuntary bankruptcy set forth in this bill.

The conclusion is utterly unsound.

Mr. Chairman, my able colleague's speech abounds in the denunciation of nearly everybody who is blessed with a respectable share of this world's goods, or who may be considered plutocrats, bristles with assertions of the oppressions of the poor, parades before the country their calamities and the more prosperous man's supposed rascalities. Such language is calculated to array the poor people against the wealthy. Sir, I had to meet on the stump and to controvert similar charges made against the Democratic party in the last campaign by the extremists of the Farmers' Alliance and Populists who endeavored to encompass my defeat, and I was amazed to hear such language from a good Democrat as I know my colleague to be. The shaking of a red flag at a bull never more thoroughly angered him than does the reading of this bill my esteemed colleague.

Mr. DENSON. My colleague objected to my interrupting him awhile ago. I have been absent from the Hall, and therefore have not heard all of the gentleman's speech. Am I correctly informed that the gentleman charges me with being a Populist?

Mr. OATES. Oh, no; I say you are a good Democrat.

Mr. DENSON. And as good as you are.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman has always been a very good Democrat, but I do not undertake to set myself up as a judge in my own case as to which of us is the better Democrat.

Mr. DENSON. What was it that you stated that had inflamed my mind?

Mr. OATES. I said that the denunciations which have been made and a good many things which you had said had probably inflamed your imagination; so that I was amazed to hear such language from such a good Democrat as I knew you to be.

Mr. DENSON. I state, Mr. Chairman, that the inflammation of my mind, if any at all occurred, resulted from the iniquity and oppression of that bill, and nothing else.

Mr. OATES. Well, the free-coinage question, too, had something to do with it.

Mr. DENSON. That has inflamed your mind, it seems. You are trying to get out of it, and to explain your vote.

Mr. OATES. I quote your language. I do not travel outside the record at all. I quote exactly what you said in your speech. I am proud of my vote and stand loyally by it.

Mr. DENSON. My language was thoroughly orthodox on the free coinage of silver and there can be no mistake about that. My speeches and my votes have always corresponded, to the letter.

Mr. OATES. I stated while you were out that we agreed on free coinage, except that we differed about the ratio. But we differed widely in our votes as to the repeal of the Sherman law.

Mr. DENSON. I do not see how we could differ on the ratio, when you voted to substitute the Bland-Allison act for the Wilson law.

Mr. OATES. That question is not pertinent here, but I will say that a revival of the Bland-Allison act was the only prospect I saw for silver coinage, and it was limited. Perhaps I did a foolish thing to keep company with you.

Mr. DENSON. I was informed that you said I was populistic. If being populistic means that I am for the people, I am for that; but in the offensive sense in which the word is now used in politics, that I utterly deny.

Mr. OATES. I said some of the statements made by you were populistic, and that I was surprised to hear them, because I knew you were a Democrat.

Mr. DENSON. You drew the inference that they were populistic. Populistic may be descending, but some of yours might be considered ascending populistic—in the ascendancy. What are the statements of mine that are populistic?

Mr. OATES. That may be, but of course all such things are to be judged by others. We form our opinions from what we have to go by. I think that the quotations I am making from your speech will be sufficient to show that I have drawn the correct conclusion, and if I have not, the readers of what we both say will form their own opinions. Such appeals do not pour oil upon the troubled waters in our country. They do not draw the attention of our people, and especially the poorer classes, to the beneficence of our governments, State and Federal. In Europe the toilers labor in the fields for from 10 to 20 cents per day, and have their homes in hovels, and their children reared in comparative ignorance for the lack of public schools. Here our Federal and State governments secure to each citizen his rights of life, liberty, and property, giving them all equal chances.

Such utterances as I refer to do not impress the minds of the masses with these facts, nor do they call attention to the beneficence of the United States in having tendered to the destitute homes upon the public lands, nor to the State governments, which provide for the education of their children and the exemption of a reasonable amount of property from liability to execution, in order that they may have a maintenance independent even of the claims of their honest creditors.

Sir, I believe that the agriculturist, though of moderate means, should be the happiest man of any class in our country, when he is free from debt and reasonably prosperous.

A little farm well tilled,
A little house well filled,
And a little wife well willed—should bring to him the greatest measure of contentment.

Show our people their superior condition over those of similar classes in other countries, and bring to them contentment, and make them, with all of the errors of our laws, shout praises to the flag of our country, "the land of the free and the home of the brave," and we will perform a far more patriotic and praiseworthy duty than we will by arraigning before them all the wrongs they may be made to suffer, either real or imaginary.

TO PROMOTE THE BEST INTERESTS OF HONEST PEOPLE.

The bankruptcy bill will promote the best interests of honest people and prove a beneficent measure to thousands of people overwhelmed with debt.

Sir, the provision of the Federal Constitution committing to Congress the power to pass a bankruptcy law was inserted in that instrument as originally drafted, and was adopted as a matter of course when it was submitted for ratification. A similar provision was inserted in both the provisional and permanent constitutions of the late Confederate States, which shows that the framers thereof were not opposed to bankruptcy laws.

As a practical question it is immaterial whether we agree or disagree with our constitutional fathers or with the men who formulated the scheme for the government of the Confederacy as to the expediency for such a provision in the organic law—the fact remains that Congress has the power to enact such a law, and we are confronted with the proposition to exercise it whenever necessary on the condition of the country requiring it, as I think it does now.

The only question under the circumstances which will influence me is what is best for the interests of the people—the people of my district—the people of my State—the people of the whole country.

OPPONENTS OPPOSED TO DISCHARGES.

The present conditions are that every community contains honest men who have been unfortunate in promoting the enterprises of the country; men who can not pay their debts and who are kept out of business by their unfortunate circumstances. The fact that these men are thus circumscribed in their usefulness to the community and to their families is no benefit to their creditors—it is an absolute detriment to the communities in which they live. An enlightened public policy requires that they should be given their financial freedom. This bill would accomplish this result and enable this great class of good men to again become aggressive factors in the development of the country, the promotion of its enterprises, and to the comfort of their families. It would also be better for the creditor if he but realized a small percentage of his debt than for it always to remain in doubt.

Every member, therefore, who opposes this bill arrays himself against this class of men, and in doing so denies them the rights which it was intended by the framers of the Constitution they should enjoy.

OPPONENTS OPPOSED TO INCREASING CREDIT.

Mr. Chairman, the business of every community of this country is conducted by men who, to a greater or less degree, are dependent upon their credit. How will this bill affect this class of men? As the laws of most of the States are framed at present many men might be ruined by a fright among their creditors, or even by a misapprehension on the part of one of such creditors as to the financial condition of their debtor. This condition follows because there is not now any law which can enforce the rules of equity with uniformity and fair dealing between the creditors of a common debtor.

I received a letter to-day from New York, presenting a very striking case which has been hung up in the courts ever since 1884, where there are probably $1,000,000 worth of property involved, and one debtor who controls a claim of $8,000 is so circumstanced that he prevents a distribution of that property and keeps the creditors from getting that which belongs to them. Under the operation of a bankruptcy law this would not be the case. Under present conditions the result is that the credit of everyone of this class is restricted and whenever they are situated at obscure points or at a great distance from whom they ask or obtain credit they must of course pay a higher price, including freights, for goods than they would be compelled to pay for them if they lived nearer to the place of their purchases.

If we had a uniform commercial probate law, as this bill would be if enacted, the seller and buyer would each find therein the measure of their legal rights, and a uniform system alike enforceable in every State of the Union. In it they would find a complete system of equity and justice. Now that railroads, telegraphs, and telephones have annihilated distances and brought all the States of the nation into one great commercial community, is it not infinitely wiser and better to secure such judicial uniformity rather than to allow all commercial transactions to be administered by the forty-four different systems of the States of this Union? This bill forbids the spiriting away or fraudulently disposing of goods. It requires at the hands of every debtor an honest course of business with reference to goods which he has purchased on credit, and prevents debtors from giving preferences.

I wish to say that no preferences can be given under the laws of my State—made so by recent legislation.

All these regulations are consistent with equity and inspire confidence in those who have goods to sell, and hence secure better credit and lower prices for the purchasers of the same.

Who will deny the wisdom of such provisions?

Every member, therefore, who opposes this bill arrays himself, whether intentionally or not, against this class of men, and in so doing denies to them the increased credit, or in effect the enlargement of their capital, and prevents them from deriving a benefit which was intended to be their inheritance.

OPPONENTS OPPOSED TO REDUCING PRICES TO CONSUMERS.

Sir, all of the trade and manufacturing centers of this country have establishments which give employment to large numbers of the working classes, and, in the ordinary course of business, distribute the things we eat, the clothes we wear, the machinery we use, the tools and implements of industry, and the various other articles the distribution of which constitutes the commerce of our country. These manufacturing and jobbing concerns, under the existing imperfect State enactments, experience severe losses on the part of mercantile adventurers and those who subsist by committing frauds in their various forms.

To the thoughtless person it might appear that these losses are borne by the manufacturers and jobbers, but it is not so; they know by years of experience about what these losses will be, and they add a percentage to the price of their output to meet them. This percentage is paid not by the dishonest and fraudulent adventurers, but by the honest people—by our constituents. This law is designed to promote justice, which is always consistent with morality, and to prevent these abuses. As a result, the losses to the manufacturers and jobbers will not be so great; they will not, therefore, add so large a percentage and the great body of honest people will be correspondingly benefited. This bill would thus have a tendency to make manufactured goods cheaper to the consumer.

Every member, therefore, who opposes this bill, though unconscious of the fact, arrays himself against these beneficent results.

OPPONENTS ADVANCE THE INTERESTS OF THOSE WHO THRIVE BY DISHONESTY.

Sir, there is in every community of any considerable size, and I regret to say in some of the very small communities, men to whom honesty is an unknown proposition; men who are strangers to the word integrity; men who do not seek to establish a good character, and to assist in building up the community in which they live by personal industry, but whose sole end and aim is to lead an existence at the expense of those who accumulate property by honest toil. This bill aims a blow of extermination at that class of men.

It prescribes penalties for whoever cheats, wrongs, or defrauds irrespective of whether they are bankrupts, bankruptcy officers, or creditors. It seems to me high time that such a statute should be enacted, as one has but to read the daily papers to realize that from day to day and week to week, the year round, frauds of every nature and description are practiced, and their perpetrators go unwhipped of justice.

Every member, therefore, who opposes this bill will in so doing throw his influence practically on the side of that class of men who, to the detriment of the best interests of the honest members of every community in the country, are now, and have been for years, living on the fruits of dishonesty.

THE PEOPLE ARE HONEST AND WANT AN HONEST LAW.

Sir, I am sorry to see that there seems to be on the part of some of my Congressional brethren an inclination to legislate upon the theory that the enactment of a law granting discharges, enforcing the rules of equity, and forbidding rascality is in derogation of the rights of the people.

For myself, I wish to stand or fall upon the statement of fact that the great body of the people are absolutely and unconditionally honest; that they do not wish for themselves the exercise of any rights which they are not willing, under like circumstances, others may exercise. It would be an insult to intelligent and honest people to say that they do not want laws to condemn wrong and to promote justice, morality, and humanity, which are the purposes of this bill.

The proposed law was contemplated by the founders of the Government; it is sound in principle; it is humane and equitable in its provisions; it is in the interest of the unfortunate debtor and the honest creditor, and repels oppression; it is designed to lessen the burdens of the weak and curb the power of the strong; it will promote honesty and discourage dishonesty; it will benefit good people in every part of the country and in every station in life, and hence, I earnestly hope that it will be passed, with both voluntary and involuntary provisions of a reasonable and just character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. OATES. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, but will not accept an extension of time as it is already quite late. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not near through with the replies I have prepared in explanation of the bill and to the criticisms uttered against the same by several of the gentlemen who oppose the measure. If the House will grant me leave to do so I will hereafter print these with some tables I have applied for and not yet fully obtained, separately from this and as a subsequent speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks leave to print the remainder of his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the leave is granted.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill is now closed by order of the House.

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee do now rise; and I wish to give notice in that connection that on to-morrow, or when the bill is taken up again, it will be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Just at that point I suggest that if we could take the sense of the House as between the voluntary and involuntary systems, we might dispense with the necessity for the five-minute debate; and if we should agree to it I would be glad on to-morrow to offer a substitute which I intend to propose, and take the sense of the House on that. If it should be adopted it would then relieve the House from the necessity of considering the present bill under the five-minute rule, and we might save two or three days in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to hear the gentleman's response.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman's proposition will not be in order at that time, and it is one-sided.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course it is not in order; I was suggesting an arrangement by unanimous consent.

The question was taken, and the committee determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENCAMPMENT OF KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. Res. No. 93. To authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the monument grounds and reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits to the executive committee Knights of Pythias for the use of the monument grounds for temporary camping purposes and the reservations or public spaces along the line of Pennsylvania avenue for the erection of stands and seats thereon on the occasion of the Pythian conclave and encampment, to be held in the city of Washington in August, 1894, if in his opinion such use will inflict no serious or permanent injury upon such grounds, reservations, or public spaces; and the District Commissioners are hereby authorized to designate such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District as they may deem necessary and proper for the purposes of the occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this joint resolution. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

On request of Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, to Mr. COMPTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCGANN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CORNISH, until Monday, on account of important business.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that members of the District Committee having reports authorized by that committee may be permitted during the day to hand them to the Clerk. I make this request for the reason that next Monday will be District day, and unless bills which are ready be reported to-day, they may not get on the Calendar for action on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD]?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The following reports of committees were handed in at the Clerk's desk, referred to their appropriate calendars, and otherwise disposed of as indicated below:

APPOINTMENT OF SEALER AND ASSISTANT SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. COBB of Alabama, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SERVICE CONNECTIONS WITH WATER MAINS AND SEWERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back in the nature of a substitute for House bill 2360 the bill (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALLEYS IN SQUARE NO. 751, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square No. 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Pending that motion I desire to submit a proposition to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. I wish to inquire whether he is willing that we take a vote now upon a motion to substitute a bill which I shall offer for the bill which he has reported. I wish to say to him that I make this proposition in perfectly good faith, because if the House should determine to adopt the substitute it would dispense with the debate under the five-minute rule, and that would save not less than three days of valuable time.

Mr. OATES. In reply to the gentleman's proposition, I will say that I have no right to make an agreement outside of the rules of the House; it is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. I say that I have no right to make an agreement for other members outside and independent of the rules of the House. The gentleman's substitute will be in order after awhile, and he can then offer it.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; but I wanted to save time. In view of the gentleman's response I will ask unanimous consent that the House now take a vote on a motion to substitute a bill which will be offered for the bill which has been reported and is now pending. I think this proposition ought to be voted on before proceeding to the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The proposition requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir; and I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OATES. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bankruptcy bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I suggest that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. I do not think this reading necessary if the gentleman from Alabama will consent to allow the consideration of the bill to proceed at once. The bill will be read by sections at any rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk was about to begin the reading of the bill by sections for the consideration of amendments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then, before the first section is read, I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, in charge of the bill, that the consideration of this section be postponed for the present. This section embraces definitions of words or phrases used throughout the bill. A number of gentlemen wish to offer amendments to this section; but that can not be done intelligently until the remainder of the bill has been considered. I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Alabama that the reading and consideration of this first section be postponed until the remainder of the bill has been read and considered.

Mr. OATES. I have no objection to that whatever. In accordance with the gentleman's suggestion I ask that the first section be passed over——

Mr. BLAND. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has the floor.

Mr. OATES. I ask that this section be passed over with the privilege of returning to it hereafter.

Mr. BLAND. I want to save the right to move to strike out the enacting clause. I might not have that right after the first section is read. I have no objection to the reading of the first section if this right be reserved, or I will make the motion now. If in order, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to postpone the reading of the first section of this bill. Pending that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] moves to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, there were, on a division—ayes 70, noes 72.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask for tellers?

Mr. BLAND. I have made the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. OATES were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 91.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. OATES. I give notice that I shall demand the yeas and nays in the House on that vote.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the committee rises now and the House refuses to concur with the committee in its recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out, will the House then again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to further consider the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be for the House to determine.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then no further steps could be taken if the House acquiesces in the action of the committee except to dispose of the one recommendation? Am I correct?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Chair will direct the Clerk to read clause 7 of Rule XXIII it will be found to explain fully the status of this question.

Mr. BLAND. It is a question for the Speaker to determine in the House, and not for the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. This explains the action that the House will take.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the clause of the rule referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend, and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House. But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 139, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House concur in the action of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLAND. I presume that is the only question before the House?

The SPEAKER. That is the question that the House is to consider.

Mr. OATES. And I demand the yeas and nays on that vote.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to be recognized on this question.

Mr. BLAND. On the pending motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have the floor for a minute, I suppose, or an hour, if I choose to occupy the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has been recognized.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I only want to say that if I understand the question—and I shall not occupy the attention of the House but for a very few minutes only, unless some gentleman wants time—I wish to say but a few words on the situation in which we find this bill.

In common, Mr. Speaker, with many other gentlemen of this body, no doubt during the last session and during this session we have heard—I at least have known—that this bill was under discussion. I have heard two or three speeches made under the hour rule touching the merits of the same. But we understand, all of us, that the real debate upon any bill, general in its character like this, is not the debate under the hour rule, but is that debate which arises under the five-minute rule in Committee of the Whole when the bill is read section by section for amendments and consideration.

Now, I say no new thing to the membership of this House when I tell them, performing the duties upon our respective committees as we do—duties which are committed to us, and being thus enabled from time to time upon matters reported from the committees, to give information to the House—that in the main the membership of the House not upon the committees having in charge important bills know but little of these measures, and can know but little of the general measures reported to the House until they come before the great Committee of the Whole for discussion under the five-minute rule. I want to be honest with the House, and so, speaking for myself, I will say frankly that I have not yet read this bill.

And, Mr. Speaker, if I was going to give a guess about it I would guess that about two-thirds of the membership of the House have not read it either. I intended to become familiar with its provisions under the five-minutes rule in the Committee of the Whole, as we usually do upon great bills of this kind. Now, we went into Committee of the Whole, but before one amendment had been offered to the bill or any attempt to offer an amendment so as to reach the real debate on the bill, a motion is made by the gentleman from Missouri to strike out the enacting clause; which motion is carried. The committee rises and makes that recommendation to the House, and we now proceed to vote upon the striking out of the enacting clause of this great bill without a majority of the House having ever heard it read.

I do not believe that it is wise to take such action; and I say now that I am not speaking as an advocate of this bill. I do not know whether I am for it or against it, because I have not read it, and have not had the time to read it while performing the duties of my committee and my duties as a member of this House, with which I am specially charged.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Debate is not in order upon the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I believe I have an hour. I think I want about five or ten minutes.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point of order that debate is not in order upon the report made by the Committee of the Whole; and if the Chair will read paragraph 7 of Rule XXIII, there is no other conclusion. I appeal to the experience of the Chair and of every member on this floor that debate is never allowed on a report coming from the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is simply because usually in such cases the previous question is ordered by the House, and it has not been ordered in this instance.

Mr. HATCH. The previous question never has been considered as necessary to stop debate upon such a proposition as this.

Mr. DINGLEY. Always.

Mr. HATCH. The House must vote directly upon the proposition. The paragraph reads—

A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Whenever a bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House. But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that paragraph contemplates an immediate vote upon the motion made by my colleague [Mr. BLAND] to concur in the action of the Committee of the Whole, and there is but one motion in order taking precedence of that motion, which is a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee that the House may determine upon. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In reply to that, this is a motion to concur in the recommendation of a committee of this House. It is like all other propositions. It is subject to debate and consideration by the House, at the pleasure of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Unless the previous question is ordered.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman in charge of the motion [Mr. BLAND] failed, as I thought purposely, to move the previous question, in order that it might have some little discussion and debate in the House. If the position of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is correct, then we have a rule that would take it out of the power of the House, when this motion comes before it for the first time, to have one word of debate, and nothing could be left to us but to vote. The rule does not say so.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question right there?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. With great pleasure.

Mr. HATCH. Does not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] bear in mind that general debate upon this bill has been closed by the action of the House? General debate upon the merits of the bill has been closed and concluded in the Committee of the Whole, and after passing that stage the action of the Committee of the Whole composed of the same members as the House, has determined the fate of this bill so far as that committee was concerned by voting for the proposition to strike out the enacting clause. Now, when such action has been reported to the House heretofore. I challenge the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to name one single instance in his long experience in the House, and to prove it by the RECORD, where this motion has ever been under debate.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman that there never has been one minute of debate as to the details of this measure in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under our system of rules all matters are debatable unless there is some express limitation in the rules. The general rule is that any proposition is debatable. Debate was exhausted in Committee of the Whole, but not in the House. The House instructed the committee to close debate, but this is in the nature of an amendment. True, if it is concurred in by the House, it finally disposes of the bill; but in the absence of the previous question the Chair thinks the matter is debatable. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in order that he might have an opportunity to move the previous question if he desired to do so. The gentleman did not move it, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Gentlemen will observe in the Digest a statement on page 352:

A motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill is debatable in like manner as are other amendments.

This does not refer to any specific authority, but it is the view of the compiler of the Digest.

Mr. HATCH. I beg to call the Speaker's attention to the fact that it does not say that a report from the Committee of the Whole, making such a recommendation, is debatable.

The SPEAKER. Where is the rule that prohibits it?

Mr. HATCH. The statement of the Digest evidently refers to an original motion in the House itself.

The SPEAKER. Where is there any rule which prohibits debate? The general rule of the House is that all propositions are debatable unless there is something in the rules which negatives the right.

Mr. HATCH. I called the attention of the Speaker to, and read, clause 7 of Rule XXIII, which, in my judgment, according to that rule, determines it. In the universal practice of the House, if a bill was pending in the House, and an amendment made to strike out the enacting clause, and the previous question was not ordered, certainly it would be debatable; but this is a report from the committee.

The SPEAKER. Every amendment reported from the committee to the House is debatable, unless the previous question is ordered, on any bill.

Mr. HATCH. This is a report of the committee, and paragraph 7, Rule XXIII, does not treat it as an amendment; and that clause of the rule specifies directly how it shall be disposed of by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, so far as he has considered the rule, that this matter is debatable, unless the previous question is ordered. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, to resume at the point where I was interrupted——

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois does not state the proposition correctly. We have had a general discussion of this bill. Now, it is very proper to offer a motion to strike out the enacting clause, which brings the issue up squarely whether or not this House is prepared at all to pass a system of involuntary bankruptcy. I fully concur with my friend from Illinois that, if a majority of the House is in favor of a system of involuntary bankruptcy at all, this motion should be voted down, and then this bill should be taken up for consideration by sections; but if it be a fact that a majority of the House is in favor at all of a system of involuntary bankruptcy, it seems to me that this is the proper method now to dispose of it, and it is not premature, that being the exact question to be determined.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, while I have not read the bill, yet I have heard two or three speeches, so that I think I am warranted in saying that this bill is a bill for voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy; that it covers both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy; and it is not a question whether you have a bill for involuntary bankruptcy proceedings, but whether you will have a bill for either voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy. That is the question, because this motion goes to the whole bill, and if it prevails in this House further consideration is out of order, and the bill for voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy is dead. If, however——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. A little later on.

Mr. BAILEY. Just at that point.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if he believes that, should this motion prevail, that will prevent the House from subsequently considering and passing a bill for a purely voluntary system of bankruptcy?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. A bill might be introduced, go to the Committee on the Judiciary, receive consideration there, and come in for either voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy, or both; but if this motion is concurred in, this bill is as dead as a door-nail; and there can be no parliamentary motion made touching it under the rules of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. But a new bill could be introduced and passed?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes; the millennium might be brought about, too.

Now, then, if we go back to the Committee of the Whole, reversing the recommendation of the committee, we have a bill that is already printed, on which notice of amendments have been given, and in Committee of the Whole, where the only real debate is had, under the five-minute rule, every member has unlimited power, until he is cut off by a majority, of amending or striking out or substituting in Committee of the Whole, and making such a bill as the committee desires to make, and reporting it back to the House; and that is the proper course, in my judgment, to pursue. It saves time and disposes of the whole question when we get through its consideration, and gives us a bill for voluntary bankruptcy alone, if such is the wish of the House, or a bill for involuntary as well as voluntary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the great difficulty in his proposition is this, that the provisions of involuntary bankruptcy and voluntary bankruptcy are so interwoven together and so dependent upon each other, so far as the administrative features are concerned, that it would be utterly impossible for the Committee of the Whole to carve one out from the other and have an actual, substantial system left.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why, my friend from Texas, with his long experience, certainly can not be sincere in that suggestion, or else he has not given this situation his usual attention. It is in order, at the proper stage in Committee of the Whole, to move a substitute for this whole bill, presenting the feature of voluntary bankruptcy alone, and if that is the sense of the committee they will report it to the House. The gentleman is on the Judiciary Committee; he is one of the best lawyers in the House, and has given this subject consideration. Let him, at the proper stage in Committee of the Whole, give us the bankrupt bill that he favors, and in all probability he will find that the majority of the committee will favor it. I do not stand here pleading for this bill, but I do stand for an orderly consideration of the subject by the great committee of the House, where we can have real debate and unlimited amendment and a disposition of this important question.

Now, having said that much as to the grounds of my opposition to concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, let me talk a very few minutes about the necessity of legislation along this line. Gentlemen know the condition of this country. Gentlemen understand that this Congress was convened in an extraordinary session, which lasted three months, in which there was important legislation, in which, at least, we came together in this House and passed a bill far-reaching in its consequences. I do not propose to discuss that bill now; it was discussed during the special session. It was passed, under practical duress, with the whole business of the country breaking up, with banks suspending everywhere, and business men going to the wall. The people, like drowning men, caught at straws, and demanded that there should be some legislation, without understanding clearly whether it would give relief or not, going upon the theory that nothing could make things worse than the then status.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We did make them worse, though.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will not discuss at this time the question of whether we did or not; I am speaking now of the present condition of the country. Mr. Speaker, who is it that moves the business of this great country and of the world? That business is not moved in your bank parlors; it is not moved by the capitalists. True, it is necessary to have capital, and to preserve it, and give it all the rights to which it is entitled. Capital constitutes part and parcel of our great commercial civilization. I stand not here to inveigh against it.

But, gentlemen, if you wait for the business of this country to be moved by those who have accumulated great blocks of fixed capital, you will wait in vain. It is the labor of the country, it is the man that follows the plow, the man that works in the factory from day to day, that he may produce, that he may live, who consumes and who moves the wheels of commerce and of production. Then there comes in another class between the man who lives in the sweat of his face and the man that has an accumulation of labor in the shape of capital, the promoter, the wide-awake business man who ventures something, who takes the capital upon loan and puts it into a thousand different enterprises. At this time a very large percentage of those men who are connected with the active life of commerce have been driven to the wall and are powerless, burdened down with debt and misfortune which ordinary wisdom did not enable them to avoid. They are in every State, in every county, in every town of this broad land.

Now, the sooner this country gives that class of men, so essential to its prosperity, a chance to start anew and run a business course, without being subjected to daily embarrassment from debts they can never pay, so much the sooner we shall have cleared the decks for action. A vote to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, on the plea that the bill provides an involuntary bankrupt system, strikes out the voluntary part of it at the same time. I am not for that. It may be that there ought to be a well-advised involuntary bankrupt provision which would reach the dishonest man, the vulture, the thief, that once in a while creeps into commerce.

We will consider that if we get back into the committee and insert it or strike it out as may seem best to a majority; but for one I will not shut the door in the face of multiplied thousands who make the very lifeblood, so to speak, of the business of this country, by saying that there shall be no legislation whatever providing for either voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy. I stand here in the minority, not responsible for legislation except for my own vote. You gentlemen upon the other side have to pull the wagon, and I am content, after you and we understand the position, that you shall pull it in whatever direction a majority of the House sees fit; but I say to you in all candor that it seems to me that, for the good of the common country, you had better call a halt before you refuse all legislation upon this subject. Wise, right-minded men throughout the length and breadth of this country believe that the present condition north and south, east and west, is a condition that, economically considered, need not and ought not to exist.

I believe, just as much as I believe that I stand here this afternoon talking in the American House of Representatives—I believe that if the people of this country could realize at this hour that there would be no economic legislation during this Congress or during this Administration they would take a new hold; that a thousand factories would start before next week, and that the 150,000 men who are ready and willing to work in my own city of Chicago alone would have work at a fair wage before the sun went down on Saturday of next week. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I can not say that I hope any such assurance will be given by either of the coördinate branches of this Congress. We know that the President will not give such assurance, because he has dealt with this matter plainly and directly in his message, instructing this House and informing the House and the country for the first time what should be and would be done by an obedient House and an obedient Senate. So that I can not hope for prosperity or commercial peace or confidence along the lines of sound policy. Therefore, as you are to journey in the valley of despondency, to journey along without remunerative employment of labor or of capital, in God's name, gentlemen of the majority, as you make your victims, at least pull off from them, as they fall by the thousands in the highways of trade and production, the shackles that they wear, and which can not be removed except by the Congress of the United States, acting under the Constitution, and enacting a bankrupt law under which they may be so relieved, that on the morrow they may take up the burden of life, and, though under onerous conditions, make bread for themselves, their wives, and their children.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS].

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the country demands a bankrupt law. It is not so particular as to what that law shall be. Any law by which an equitable execution can be worked upon the property of an insolvent debtor, and that property reduced to money, and the money divided among the creditors, and the insolvent discharged from his indebtedness, is a bankrupt law. Everything else is incidental and matter of detail.

Now, I wish to say just a word in favor of the much-abused bankrupt law of 1867. There never was a bankrupt law framed that had more careful or able consideration than that law. One of the ablest lawyers of the country framed that law. It was perfected by eleven years of amendment in Congress and by eleven years in construction of its provisions by the courts; so that, on the 7th of June, 1878, when that law was repealed, it was the most perfect bankrupt law that ever graced any statute book.

If this motion shall prevail, there will be no opportunity to vote, even to restore the bankrupt law of 1867; and in my judgment that is the thing to do. Repeal the repealing act, and we have a full-fledged bankrupt act ready at our hands to go into operation at once. Any new law that you may pass will require ten years of judicial construction to mature its provisions. There are a set of reports, consisting of eighteen or twenty volumes of decisions, under the bankrupt law of 1867; and you are going to fling them all away. They cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. Why not, when we have such a law as that right at our doors, simplify the business by repealing the repealing act, and going on under the old law?

But, Mr. Speaker, there is no opportunity under the pending motion to present any substitutes for this bill. If the motion shall prevail, that is the end of the matter—neither the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], nor one I intended to offer, restoring the old law, can come before the House.

As my time is about to expire, let me say in conclusion that I hope this motion will be defeated, and the bill perfected under the five-minute rule, or if that can not be done, that the bill be referred back to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to report some other measure, so that in some shape we may relieve the insolvent debtors of the country. Mr. Speaker, there are to-day thousands of successful business men who took the benefit of the bankrupt law of 1867. Under that act they were freed from the slavery of their debts, and they have become successful in business. Many of them have paid their old debts in full.

We do not want to drive men out of business. When a man after becoming insolvent has given up all his property to his creditors, let him go ahead and do business again in his own name. Let us say to this large class—enormously increased by the hard times of the present year—"We will give you some relief." Let us not act in the interest of those repudiating States, that are fearful that a bankrupt law will operate in the interest of the creditor as well as the debtor. Such a law should be in the interest of both. A uniform system of collecting debts all over the country, in every one of the forty-four States, is in the interest of honesty in the interest of commerce, in the interest of everything that subserves the good of society.

Mr. BLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. BLAND. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] states this proposition very clearly, I think, when he says that it is not to the capital piled up in the banks of the country that we must look for the revival of business or that should receive our main regard in our legislation with reference to the prosperity of the country. But, sir, this bill, if I conceive it aright, is a bill to compel the debtors of the country to go to the banks that have their capital piled up and borrow from them at large rates of interest, or else go into bankruptcy. Gentlemen who are interested in banking capital, not in farming or manufacturing concerns, may very properly advocate this bill.

At a time of panic and distress, when manufacturers, farmers, mechanics, and persons engaged in all branches of industry are simply asking a little time, a little postponement, with an opportunity to secure their property from confiscation and to enter again upon business enterprises, we propose by this bill to put the whole business interests of this country into bankruptcy and let the bankers loot those interests. That is the effect of the measure. Thousands of men throughout the country who are in debt, who are a little cramped in their business operations, and desire a little further time will recover themselves if we will let them alone, if we will permit them to go on in the usual manner under State laws without interfering with them, and they will finally get out of debt and become prosperous.

But here is a bill declaring all of these debts practically due at this time, and if a man can not meet his obligations, pay his expenses, or liquidate all of his debts from day to day, he is subject to be declared a bankrupt and his business and property confiscated. It is simply putting in bankruptcy the whole people of the country and subjecting them to be fleeced by the bankers and the banking capital of which the gentleman from Illinois speaks.

Mr. Speaker, if there is a demand for a bankruptcy system in the United States at all, it certainly is not a present demand. It is not asked for at this time. It is not demanded by the business men engaged in manufacturing and business enterprises.

It is demanded, if at all, by the mercantile community and by the banking community, who desire to go out upon the shores of our financial distress and reap their rich reward from the wrecks of the business and fortunes of the masses of the people. It is pressed here by that class of people, and not by the laboring people, by the manufacturing, the farming, or business people of the country. There is no question about that. The vote in the Committee of the Whole and the record of the rolls of this House will show the interests which are involved in it.

Now, sir, the gentleman talks about striking out the enacting clause of the bill as though it was something unusual. I have seen it done frequently in this House. I have seen, sir, the enacting clause of a tariff bill stricken out in committee and the bill so reported back to the House. If the House is not ready for this bill, if it does not wish to pass a bankruptcy bill at this time, why spend the time of the House in further discussion of it? My own experience about these amendments of which the gentleman speaks as perfecting the bill is that it is not unusual in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, when the members are inattentive, when they are in the cloak rooms or scattered about, that amendments are placed on the bill making it ten times worse than it was before. For my own part I would rather take the present bill, bad as it is, if we are to have a bankruptcy bill at all, than to run the risk of what may be added to it in Committee of the Whole.

All of this special plea, Mr. Speaker, about involuntary bankruptcy comes from a source that is well understood. We know where the plea comes from. The gentleman from Illinois, when he stated that there ought to be some involuntary bankruptcy proceedings as well as voluntary proceedings, if I understood him correctly, meant——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, I suggest, first, that there ought to be a voluntary system of bankruptcy, and a bill providing for that purpose passed. I think it entirely likely, also, that there might be an involuntary provision, and there ought to be such a provision to catch dishonest men. I think, though, from the little talk I have heard during this debate, that it is altogether likely the involuntary part of this bill is not wise, and I stand ready, if it is subject to that criticism, to help to perfect it. But for a voluntary bankruptcy bill, and an involuntary provision, if it shall be enacted, I stand ready.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, we are now in the beginning of the long session of Congress. If this House determines that it wants no involuntary bankruptcy bill, now is the time to determine it: and the Committee on the Judiciary can then frame and introduce here a voluntary bankruptcy bill, and if the gentleman from Illinois wishes to vote for it, it is in his power to do so. But I take it for granted that the membership of this House want no part of this bill, and that it is dangerous to go into Committee of the Whole to undertake to amend a bill that has been already condemned by the House.

Now, sir, I do not desire to take up the time of the House in any further discussion of the bill, and if there is no gentleman desiring to speak upon the subject I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out, and on that the gentleman from Missouri demands the previous question.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Is a motion to refer in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending a demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question recurred on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. OATES. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 111, not voting 99; as follows:

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 443) to provide for the sale of new tickets by the street-railway companies of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 445) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, and also an act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2796) relating to the qualifications of registers and receivers of the United States land offices, and making provision in case of such disqualification, reported it with an amendment.

SETTLERS ON MILLE LAC INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation in Minnesota.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered at the present time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to be informed as to the effect of the joint resolution. I understand that it proposes to establish entries within an Indian reservation. I inquire whether that would not defeat one of the objects of the reservation by introducing white settlers, with title of property, within the reservation. I should be sorry to see a measure adopted that would, to some extent, break up an Indian reservation by introducing white settlers with title to land among them.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will state that the joint resolution affects only some three hundred settlers who filed their claims during the last four or five years and have made improvements. The Mille Lac Reservation is really no longer an Indian reservation. The Indians are remaining there only through sufferance. Under the act of January 14, 1889, there was an arrangement made whereby those Indians are to be entirely removed to the White Earth Reservation. So the joint resolution does not in any way affect the rights of Indians, or anybody else, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if there is any contest on the part of the Indians against being removed from the reservation.

Mr. WASHBURN. None whatever. There is no contest that I know of anywhere.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF PAMPHLETS ON NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the usual number of the pamphlets known as the Discovery of Nebraska and A Visit to Nebraska in 1662, communicated by Hon. James W. Savage to the Historical Society, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the Monument grounds and reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

The bill (H. R. 3544) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof; and

The joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of the Third Regiment, United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION IN HAWAII.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if in his opinion it be not inconsistent with the public interest, whether any person whose name has not been submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent, and if so, what person, has been appointed since the 4th day of March, 1893, to represent the United States in the Hawaiian Islands; and

Whether such person has been accredited to the President of the Executive and Advisory Council of the Hawaiian Islands; and

Whether such person has been presented to the head of the Government of the Hawaiian Islands; and

Whether any, and if so what authority has been given to such person touching the relations of this Government to the then existing or other government of the Hawaiian Islands and the protection of American citizens therein; and

Whether any discretion or power has been committed to such person to determine when the naval forces of the United States should be landed therein or withdrawn therefrom; and

Whether any authority has been committed to such person to use physical force in the territory of said Government, or to land an armed force there; and

Whether such person has been authorized to, or has in fact corresponded in regard to the public affairs of the Government of the Hawaiian Islands with any private person, newspaper, or other periodical; or has been authorized to, or has in fact undertaken to receive in said Hawaiian Islands the testimony of any private person, or has requested or received written communications from any private person in regard to the lawful and existing Government there, or the circumstances under which said existing Government was established; or any other matter relating to the public affairs thereof; and

If any such appointment or authority has been made or given, further to inform the Senate whether the same was made or given at a time when the Senate was in session, or has continued in force during any session of the Senate, or of Congress, or of any part thereof; and further

Whether such appointment or authority was communicated to the Senate during any session thereof; and further

Whether any person has accepted, or undertaken to accept, the office of a commissioner or public minister with the power aforesaid, or any of them, or has undertaken in any correspondence with the Government of Hawaii, or with any private person, to describe himself as commissioner of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. I hope——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAY. Let it go over.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being objected to——

Mr. HOAR. I should like, before the resolution goes over——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw his objection?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make some remarks to announce the purpose of the resolution if the Senator from Delaware has no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw his objection?

Mr. GRAY. I think the resolution, so far as I can gather from imperfectly hearing it read at the desk, is of sufficient importance to go over, and any discussion that is to arise, as naturally it may, had better go over with it.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the custom of the Senate is without an exception that whenever a Senator introduces either a resolution or a bill and desires to make some remarks explanatory of its purpose he is allowed to do so without waiting for the time when the bill or resolution comes up under the rule. I never knew in my long experience here an objection raised to such an explanation. I wish it understood that I merely desire to make a few remarks pointing out the purpose of the resolution to accompany it.

Mr. GRAY. The resolution is upon a matter of very great public interest, in which the people are much concerned, and it will naturally provoke discussion, because, if we may judge from the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts the other day, upon a similar resolution, he had a great deal to say in a very emphatic way, which will naturally provoke some discussion, interlocutions, and what not. I think the resolution had better go over until to-morrow. I am always very glad, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows, to hear him on any public question, and if I thought it would interfere with hearing him I should be the last one to interpose an objection. But I know we shall hear him.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to have the question understood, Mr. President. The Senator from Delaware, whether——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw his objection?

Mr. GRAY. I withdraw my objection for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Massachusetts to explain his resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; that is all I wish to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if the Secretary will send me the resolution which is before the Senate I desire to make some brief observations in explanation of it.

I suppose every Senator understands that certain allegations in regard to public facts have been extensively made in the press of this country and of foreign countries. They have been the subject of comment by members of this body and by persons addressing the people on public questions in the recent campaign, both members of this body and others, and have been assumed to be true. They have met with no denial or question from any quarter; and yet they have not been communicated to this body or to the public from any official source.

If there has been any communication made to the members of this body as individuals that communication has been marked "confidential," and I am informed beyond question, while that communication marked "confidential" was in the possession of Senators, without any withdrawal of the confidence, a high officer of the Department of State communicated the same information to the representatives of four newspapers, not being marked "confidential" so far as they were concerned, and on being applied to by the representatives of other newspapers declined, on the alleged ground that the newspaper applying would not make good use of the information. Those four newspapers were zealous, thoroughgoing, and I had almost said unscrupulous supporters of the Administration.

Mr. President, one of those allegations is that the President of the United States, on the 7th day of March, 1893, the Senate then being in session, commissioned a person to proceed to the island of the Hawaiian group in which Honolulu is situated, and accredited him by letter as a commissioner of this Government to that Government; that he gave the officer instructions to represent the purposes and opinions of this Government to that Government; authorized him to have full access to the archives; said in the letter of instructions that he was to be paramount as the representative of the United States in that island, and directed the ordinary minister of the United States there to that effect. If that allegation be true, it seems to me as gross a violation of the Constitution of the United States as was ever charged upon or imputed to any public official.

The Constitution of the United States expressly enumerates "ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls" among the persons who must be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. If anybody be a public minister within the meaning of the Constitution, it is certainly a person whose authority is paramount in representing the United States over other public functionaries in the kingdom or power to which he is accredited. A person accredited to a foreign friendly power, with authority to command the Navy of the United States to preserve order, to protect the rights of the citizens of the United States, there to be presented to that government, and who the ordinary representatives, both consul and ambassador, are ordered to treat as paramount to them, would seem to be a public minister.

But that is not left to this inference, plain and clear though it is, because the Legislature of the United States has expressly dealt with that question. Section 1674 of the Revised Statutes, after enumerating the powers of consuls and commercial agents and consular officers, goes on to say:

"Diplomatic officer" shall be deemed to include ambassadors, envoys extraordinary, ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, chargés d'affaires, agents, and secretaries of legation, and none others.

So by the express legislative enactment of the Revised Statutes, copied from an earlier statute, this commissioner was a diplomatic officer of the United States, and no other, unless one of the persons otherwise enumerated in that section should be such officer.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to say here nor to say to the American people that an attempt to usurp the power of appointing and commissioning such officer, without the consent of this body, is an attempt to usurp a power over all the diplomatic relations of this Government, which otherwise would require the assent of this body or the assent of the two legislative departments of the Government.

That, too, is not left to any inference of mine. When the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States established the provision for the appointment of foreign ministers, including ambassadors and other ministers, the power of such appointment was, in the first place, separated from the other constitutional powers of the President and lodged in Congress; and Mr. Madison, I think it was, declared that the man who could create the judges of a country would have exclusive power over their laws. So the power which could create by its own unchecked will the foreign officers of the country would have exclusive control of the foreign policy of the country. After full discussion the power was shared with the two branches of the Government as it now stands.

Mr. President, what, if these statements which unchallenged and unquestioned have passed current in the country for the past three months be true, has been the purpose for which that diplomatic officer has been sent to the Hawaiian Islands, and what has been his conduct there? I wish the Secretary to read a single section of the Revised Statutes of the United States in regard to the powers of these officers. I call attention to section 1751 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which I ask the Secretary to be kind enough to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 1751. No diplomatic or consular officer shall correspond in regard to the public affairs of any foreign government with any private person, newspaper, or other periodical, or otherwise than with the proper officers of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if the statements which have been taken for granted on both sides of this Chamber be true, this diplomatic officer, unconstitutionally appointed by a gross usurpation of power when the Senate was in session, on the 7th day of March, 1893, proceeded to Hawaii, and proceeded to open correspondence with private persons there in regard to the public affairs of that country. He called before him certain citizens, he addressed letters to other citizens, he took their replies orally, requested them to reduce their oral communications to writing, and transmitted that private correspondence to the President of the United States.

If there can be conceived a case which this legislation was intended to prohibit, it would be the entry upon the territory of a foreign government and the corresponding with private persons or taking their testimony in regard to the lawfulness of the establishment of that government.

Does anybody suppose that the United States of America would submit for a moment to the presence of a British minister, or the minister of any other power, who should establish headquarters and invite correspondence with disaffected private persons in regard to the character or the lawfulness of the established Government of the United States, or in regard to the title of the existing Executive to his office?

Mr. President, the one thing above all others at which that legislation was aimed is the thing which is said to have been done. The United States would never have dreamed—I will not say would never have dared, but it would never have dreamed—in its scrupulous regard for its own honor at any time before the year of our Lord 1893 of sending an envoy to open correspondence in regard to the public affairs of the nation to which he is accredited with its private citizens, or denizens there not citizens.

So this act charged—I will not say whether truly or not, but charged by the press of the United States and not denied—the usurpation of the functions of appointing a foreign ambassador or minister in violation of Constitution and law alike, was followed by an equally gross violation of the express law of the land as found upon our statute books by the person so unconstitutionally appointed.

Mr. President, the public belief goes further than this. It goes so far as to suppose—I do not say whether truly or not—that this official reported his gross and palpable violation of the law of the United States to the authority from which he derived his appointment, and, instead of being reproved, instead of being instantly recalled, he was rewarded, or at any rate the act was followed by a regular and ordinary diplomatic appointment to the same Government.

It seems to me that the honor of the United States, that the dignity of the Senate, that the honor of the Executive itself requires a prompt and immediate and indignant refutation of these charges, which are so extensively made. Our statutes are full of safeguards and precautions against a usurpation of this kind. Section 1684 of the Revised Statutes says:

To entitle any charge d'affaires, or secretary of any legation or embassy to any foreign country, or secretary of any minister plenipotentiary, to compensation, they shall respectively be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There is a further provision in regard to the receiving of salary by other diplomatic officers. Section 1760 of the Revised Statutes provides:

No money shall be paid from the Treasury to any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval, as salary, in any office when the office is not authorized by some previously existing law unless such office is subsequently sanctioned by law

Mr. President, there is another matter to which I should like to have the reflections of my honorable friend from Delaware address themselves before this resolution comes up to-morrow. It is this: As I have said, no communication upon this subject has yet been received by the Senate in its official capacity. Whatever public communications have been made, have been made to the press, and to favored members of the press; and yet, perhaps, I am stating more than I ought to state in regard to that matter, because if the reports in the New York World of yesterday, and I think in the New York Evening Post of Saturday afternoon, be true, our ambassador to England, who understands too well diplomatic propriety and precedent by long experience in the office of Secretary of State and long experience in this body to violate them, has been instructed to make a communication to the English public, in which the information withheld from the American people and withheld from us is most freely communicated. I ask the Secretary to read from the New York World of Sunday, December 10, beginning with "London December 9."

The Secretary read as follows:

LONDON, December 9.

A representative of the Associated Press showed United States Ambassador Bayard the special dispatch to the Associated Press from Auckland, and Mr. Bayard, after reading it with great interest, said:

"President Cleveland will deal with the weak Hawaiians in the most magnanimous manner, and will not force upon them a government which they have not had a full chance to discuss."

Regarding dispatches published in the Times and Standard to-day indicating that President Cleveland is about to reverse his Hawaiian policy and that new instructions to this effect have been sent to Hawaii, adding that the whole question would be sent to Congress, Mr. Bayard said:

"There can be no reversal of a policy based simply upon justice and magnanimity. President Cleveland's policy is one of noninterference. He had no intention of entering the island and deposing the Government. The policy of the United States toward Hawaii is not a selfish one. On the contrary, President Cleveland's intention is that no advantage shall be taken of the weakness of the Queen's party, and that the Queen shall have a full and fair chance to get on her feet if possible. Hawaiian native autonomy has been so enfeebled by late events that I hardly know whether the Hawaiians can avail themselves of the offer of the President to restore the Queen to the throne."

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President, if that report be authentic, which I hope will turn out not to be the case, all I have to say is this: The opinion of the honored representative of the United States at the Court of Great Britain that the present President is magnanimous I suppose is an opinion which he entertains ex officio, and which all good Democrats entertain ex parte, and I have no quarrel with that. But if he has stated to the British public that President Cleveland has offered to restore the Queen to her throne in Hawaii he has stated it of course upon full authority from the Administration that commissioned him, and therefore if that be true it is also true that for some reason of state, which we are entitled to understand, Great Britain is taken into a confidence which neither the Senate nor the people of America share.

When we heard that the President's message was published in London in the morning papers in advance of its delivery to the Senate we all supposed that one of those accidents for which nobody was specially responsible had taken place in not keeping documents secret which were intended to be secret until officially made public, but we may not assign such an explanation as that to an official communication.

Mr. President, I want this matter to be separated from all questions of our dealing with Hawaii; from all questions of annexation or protectorate or dependency; from all questions in regard to which the two parties are divided. If it be true that the President of the United States, the Senate being in session, authorized an officer to exercise paramount diplomatic authority in another country with which we are at peace, directed the consul and the resident minister to promote his success by every means in their power, placed the archives under his complete and untrammeled inspection, authorized him to employ at his discretion the naval power, and to land or to withdraw the forces of the United States at his will, and gave him the title which is enumerated as one of the titles of diplomatic officers in the act of Congress, he is standing, in my judgment, upon very slippery gound, and he had better step on to terra firma rapidly and at once.

If, in the next place, such an official entered that territory and established a correspondence with private persons about its public affairs, taking testimony, making written communications, receiving replies thereto, that officer violated in a most gross and palpable manner the express written law of the American people. And if he reported that action to the President and it was approved, and the President made himself an accomplice after the fact in that violation of law, he is standing upon ice not only very slippery but very thin, especially if after that act of this public commissioner he proceeded to decorate him with a new diplomatic appointment.

Mr. President, the ostrich puts his head in the sand and thinks his body will not be seen. The rhinoceros hides in his mudpuddles and breathes through the tip of his nose and thinks he will not be seen. But neither of those is a fit and suitable precedent for the Executive of the United States. The people have a right to know, wish to know, and will know, let me say to my honorable friend, the truth in this matter. If in addition to all this the public policies in regard to grave foreign matters now, when the third session of the Senate has gone on for a week—it having been three months in session before, and six weeks in session in the spring, from the 4th day of March, 1893—the first communication of a purpose to restore that queen has been made by the American minister to the people of Great Britain when we are groping after it in vain, while no Constitution or no statute may have been violated, something else has been violated which I will not now attempt to specify.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion of this Hawaiian matter, even though the Senator from Massachusetts could not, even according to the precedents and customs of the Senate, withhold or restrain himself from an indulgence in his habit of scolding an Admistration belonging to a party opposite to his own. This is the commencement of the opportunities that will come to him in this second Administration of Mr. Cleveland. He scolded all through the first Administration and has scolded him back into the White House again. I do not think the Senator is to gain anything from that sober second thought of the American people, which after all has vindicated itself time and time again in our history, by putting up hypothetical cases in regard to which he is to deliver himself of the well-conned vituperative phrases that he has entertained us with this morning. Nor do I think that our honored representative, as he justly calls him, at the court of St. James, will take much detriment by his share of this scolding: for I recollect that when that honored representative occupied another high position in the Government of the United States he came in then for the vehement—what shall I call it—lecturing of the Senator from Massachusetts; and he actually has survived it, and stands as high to-day in the estimation and in the honorable regard of his fellow-citizens as he did prior to that lecture of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I have said this much because I think that it would be better taste all around if the Senator from Massachusetts had quietly waited until the official information, which was asked for a day or two ago (and which he must know from the character of the request made there has been no opportunity yet to properly and sufficiently answer), comes to the Senate, in order that we may really have the facts, consider them, and discuss them in the light of our patriotic duty, leaving partisanship behind us in the dark places to which it belongs in a discussion of this kind. I know no partisanship where the honor of my country and of her flag is concerned.

I want to know whether the statements the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded to, with which the public press has teemed for weeks past, be indeed true; whether it be a fact that the flag of the United States has been disgraced and dishonored by a superserviceable agent of this Government and made to symbolize an act of piracy and aggression for which every honorable American ought to hang his head in shame, if indeed it be true, to use the hypothetical language of the Senator from Massachusetts.

It is very well for him and for others who agree with him to ask us again and again to avert our gaze from what is said to have gone on upon those far-distant islands in the Pacific in the middle of last January. We want to know something about that; and it was for that purpose that I cordially coöperated with the Senator from Massachusetts last week in passing a resolution of request addressed to the President of the United States that we might have as speedily as possible the information he promised us in his message. Until I feel that the giving of that information has been unduly delayed I shall possess my soul in patience, fully believing that the honor of this great Government, in which he and I are interested, is safe in his hands.

Mr. President, without attempting to go into a discussion of any of the hypothetical cases made by the Senator from Massachusetts as laying ground for the animadversions upon the Administration of his Government, I would simply remind him and the Senate and the people of the United States that the special commissioner was sent to the Hawaiian Islands because there was a transaction in those islands involving the honor of the United States between the Government of the Queen and the so-called revolutionists, in which it was made the duty of the United States to possess itself of the information that it sought to acquire by sending out a gentleman who could see with his eyes and hear with his ears what it was impossible for the President of the United States and for the Secretary of State to see with their eyes or hear with their ears, and they would have been derelict in their duty if they had not availed themselves of the ample authority they have at all times to acquire that information through an agent duly authorized by the Executive of the United States to procure it.

It will not be forgotten, Mr. President, that the so-called revolution instituted by five or six foreigners, three or four natives, and, so far as we have any information now, the accredited minister of the United States, resulted in the abdication of the then reigning Queen of those islands, and that abdication, sent to us by Mr. Stevens, the minister, and communicated to the Senate by President Harrison when he sent his message, was in these words:

> That I yield to the superior force of the United States of America, whose minister plenipotentiary, his excellency John L. Stevens, has caused United States troops to be landed in Honolulu and declared that he would support the said Provisional Government.
> Now, to avoid any collision of armed forces, and perhaps the loss of life, I do under this protest and impelled by said force yield my authority until such time as the Government of the United States shall, upon the facts being presented to it, undo the action of its representative and reinstate me in the authority which I claim as the constitutional sovereign of the Hawaiian Islands.
> Done at Honolulu the 17th day of January, A. D, 1893.
> Signed by the Queen.
> (Indorsed:) Received by the hands of the late cabinet this 17th day of January, A. D. 1893. Sanford B. Dole, chairman executive council of Provisional Government.

So the Provisional Government, which informed the Government of the United States that it came into existence to continue only until a treaty of annexation had been made with the United States, also sent to this Government the abdication of the Queen, submitting her case on her side to the President of the United States without a word of comment, explanation, or difference as to the intent or meaning of that abdication.

Mr. President, without dwelling further (and I do not intend to be drawn any further into this discussion), it will stand as the patent fact before the American people until we get better and further information that this Executive of ours was compelled by every consideration of his high duty, by every consideration pertaining to the honor of the Government of which he is the executive head, to inform himself as to the state of facts surrounding this transaction in those distant islands before he attempted to deal with it himself, or before he attempted to give information to the legislative branch of the Government.

So I think that the resolution should properly go over until to-morrow under the rule, and I ask that that order be taken.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I wish to make one observation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware withdraw for the present his objection?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has pursued certainly a very singular course in this matter. I said if it should turn out that the honored representative of this country in Great Britain had made a public communication he undoubtedly did it with full authority to do it; and the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon, I did not hear what the Senator has just said.

Mr. HOAR. I said that if the honored representative of this country in Great Britain had made a certain communication to the people there he undoubtedly did it with full authority; and that is what the Senator from Delaware calls scolding at him. That is all I said about him.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts forgets what he said about him.

Mr. HOAR. I do not forget. That is all I said about him. I said that if a high diplomatic officer, paramount in all diplomacy, had been sent abroad when the Senate was in session, it was a violation of the Constitution and statute of the United States, and if that person had corresponded with private persons in that country about its public affairs, that was a violation of our statute, and the Senator from Delaware does not venture to deny either of those propositions.

Mr. GRAY. I do deny them, Mr. President. If the Senator will allow me, I expressly said that I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion now, but if I did not deny them, I deny them now; and I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that at the proper time he will find that the ground upon which he has made this arraignment of the Administration is something very different from his hypothetical cases; and he will find that the law of the hypothetical cases is something very different from what he has stated.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has plucked up a good deal of courage since he rose before. He thought it was safer then and wiser to talk about what under a former Administration the United States minister did or did not do in Hawaii. The question being whether a diplomatic officer has been appointed and commissioned without the advice and consent of the Senate, on which we are simply asking information, and the further question being whether that officer has corresponded with private citizens there about its public affairs, the Senator thinks that suggesting that if that has been done it is a violation of our Constitution and laws is scolding, and he seems to think the proper and dignified answer to it is to indulge in some very coarse personalities about me. Well, I am willing that he should try that style of speech as long as he thinks fit. The question which we are to deal with is an American question, a question of the privileges and dignity of the Senate, a question of the prerogative of the Executive, a question of Constitution and law as applicable to a grave public occasion, and it is not in the least affected by the merits of our relation with the Government at Honolulu.

The Senator talks about my hypothetical case turning out very differently from the real one. The Senator knows the facts in this matter. He knows what instructions were given to Lord Paramount Commissioner Blount. He knows what that gentleman did; he knows what that gentleman reported; and he knows what decoration was placed upon his brows after the affair was accomplished; and it is utterly idle for him to say that certain hypothetical cases will or will not turn out to be true.

Now, Mr. President, I am very willing that the resolution shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GRAY. I never professed to know as much as the Senator from Massachusetts, and I never expect to know as much as he knows about everything.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me——

Mr. GRAY. But I had a right, I suppose, in my own way, to protest against the course which the Senator took in not telling us all he knew, which would take a great while of course, but to put hypothetical cases as a groundwork for what I ventured, without any intentional disrespect to the Senator from Massachusetts, to call his scolding. I think that is a very parliamentary word and a very moderate word. Surely, if the Senator takes offense at it and thinks it is a word which is disrespectful to him, I will withdraw it; but I am at a loss how to characterize it. What am I to say? The Senator says, in effect, that the course of conduct of the ambassador at the Court of St. James is infamous.

Mr. HOAR. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator says the President of the United States has committed an act which is only equaled in infamy by one of the worst characters of the old times in history given in the Bible, and yet I am to sit still, and Senators on this side are to sit still, and say nothing about it, and if they mildly and in a moderate manner say that they think it is scolding, out of place, and is now a little premature, they are to be called to account as indulging in coarse personal abuse.

Now, I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts, and I submit to every one within the sound of my voice, whether the language that I indulged in with reference to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts could be characterized as "coarse personal abuse." I am willing that the Senator from Massachusetts shall have a monopoly, if he wishes, of that kind of language. It may not be "coarse personal abuse" to say that the President of the United States—who is trying to do his duty (whether mistakenly or not) we all believe and the American people believe—has committed an act of infamy; it may not be "coarse personal abuse" to say that the honored representative of the United States at the Court of St. James has, in violation of every canon of diplomatic intercourse and of the proprieties of his station, taken the people of Great Britain into his confidence and given them information which is denied to the Senate, all founded upon an alleged interview with him in the newspapers, which alleged interview, even if it be true, like the hypothetical cases, does not bear out the inferences or animadversions made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and is nothing more than an expression of the private opinion of that sagacious and patriotic statesman as to what ought to be the attitude of his country. He is not represented as saying a single word as to the intentions of this Government. He merely gives voice to what rises naturally in his patriotic heart, as it would rise naturally, I believe, in the patriotic heart of every American, that when the flag of the country has been used for the purposes of dishonor, and when the authority and power and prestige of the United States have been made to cover an act of piracy, that the wrong should in some way at some time and some how be rectified. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator to read the last sentence of that interview.

Mr. GRAY. I will read it all:

President Cleveland will deal with the weak Hawaiians in the most magnanimous manner.

The Senator from Massachusetts, I suppose, will deal with the weak powers in anything but a magnanimous manner if he differs with the minister at the Court of St. James.

And will not force upon them a government which they have not had a full chance to discuss.

The Senator differs from the minister to the Court of St. James. He, I suppose, would force upon them a government which they had not a chance to discuss.

Regarding dispatches published in the Times—

Not regarding information he had received in a diplomatic way, but regarding those things about which all intelligent men and women, too, occupy their minds, the items of public information discussed in the public press, Mr. Bayard ventures to say this:

Regarding dispatches published in the Times and Standard to-day indicating that President Cleveland is about to reverse his Hawaiian policy and that new instructions to this effect have been sent to Hawaii, adding that the whole question would be sent to Congress, Mr. Bayard said:

"There can be no reversal of a policy based simply upon justice and magnanimity."

That is a horrible offense to commit. Why should he not be recalled? I suppose we can impeach him; and if we follow out the policy which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to uphold, then it will become an offense to believe or to proclaim that there should be no reversal of a policy based simply upon justice and magnanimity.

President Cleveland's policy is one of—

What?

Of noninterference.

Is that the crime which Mr. Bayard has committed?. I believe that. I say here in my place in the Senate that I believe that we ought never to have interfered. I may be mistaken, but I believe, as Mr. Bayard believes, that President Cleveland's policy is one not only of justice and magnanimity, but one of noninterference.

He had no intention of entering the island and deposing the Government.

Was that the private information he was conveying to the English people, obtained officially through his diplomatic intercourse with the Department, which was his chief?

The policy of the United States toward Hawaii is not a selfish one. On the contrary, President Cleveland's intention is that no advantage shall be taken of the weakness of the Queen's party, and that the Queen shall have a full and fair chance to get on her feet, if possible. Hawaiian native autonomy has been so enfeebled—

Says Mr. Bayard—

by late events that I hardly know whether the Hawaiians can avail themselves of the offer of the President to restore the Queen to the throne.

Mr. HOAR. That is the point. Let us hear about that.

Mr. GRAY. Very well. I have read all of the alleged interview, the last sentence and all. The Senator gets some comfort, I am afraid, in the last three lines of that patriotic utterance of Mr. Bayard, that he is afraid that the Queen's party among the Hawaiians have been so enfeebled that they can not avail themselves of the offer to restore the Queen to the throne. What does that mean, even taking this as an authentic account of what Mr. Bayard actually said? It means that when Mr. Cleveland, through the authorized diplomatic agent of the United States, disavowed the flagitious conduct of the representative of the United States last January and said we do not support the Government which deposes you any longer, that the Queen or her party will not be able to assert the physical power to restore her. That is all that the utmost ingenuity of even the Senator from Massachusetts can make out of that.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no. The Senator will pardon me. It is not all.

Mr. GRAY. I have read the whole dispatch.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but the Senator now says that all of it is that the Queen can not restore herself. What is added is that she will be unable to avail herself of the offer of the President to restore her.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator from Massachusetts suppose, if the United States were to offer to restore the Queen by physical force, that it could not do it? Why could she not avail herself——

Mr. HOAR. I did not use that language.

Mr. GRAY. Why could she not avail herself of the offer of the President of the United States to restore her? That would be absurd.

Mr. HOAR. I will tell the Senator why, as he asks the question. If the President were not only to offer to restore her, but were to restore her, unless he maintained her there by the power of the United States she would go off her throne in twenty-four hours. That is the trouble.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator reads all that in those three lines?

Mr. HOAR. No; but I am pointing out what I will not say the Senator perverts, but omits and misstates unconsciously to himself in his zeal to rush to the defense of this matter; the one thing, which is that there is a specific allegation that the President of the United States has offered or is about to offer to restore that Queen. That is the whole of it.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts unconsciously misstates, I will not say perverts, the language of this dispatch. There is not one line in it, not one word or one syllable that could be wrested into the meaning that Mr. Bayard, as our minister at the Court of St. James, or as a private and patriotic citizen of the United States, ever made the declaration or intended to be understood as conveying the information that the President of the United States had offered to restore the Queen to the throne by force. It is all based upon the dispatches in the public newspapers which this reporter had brought to his attention and founded upon them. They had stated that.

Mr. HOAR. Had they stated that the President offered to restore the Queen?

Mr. GRAY. According to this interview they had.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAY. According to this interview they had, and Mr. Bayard is discussing the dispatches.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator point that out?

Mr. GRAY. I have not the Times, but Mr. Bayard is discussing the—

Dispatches published in the Times and Standard to-day indicating that President Cleveland is about to reverse his Hawaiian policy and that new instructions to this effect have been sent to Hawaii, adding that the whole question would be sent to Congress.

Upon that this reporter puts this language—I do not know whether rightfully or wrongfully—into the mouth of the American ambassador, and that seems to boil down at last only to those three lines:

That I hardly know whether the Hawaiians can avail themselves of the offer of the President to restore the Queen to the throne.

If Mr. Bayard had intended to convey the information that the President intended to restore the Queen to the throne—and he is not to be put in the category of those men who do not understand the use of language or the meaning of words—why should he have said that the Queen was not in a condition, owing to recent events, to avail herself of that offer, when we all know it would simply take a squad of marines and a corporal's guard to depose the Provisional Government and place the Queen upon the throne?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator whether he does not agree with me, that if Mr. Bayard, the representative of this country to Great Britain, announced there that the President had offered to restore the Queen, if my view of that language is correct, he would not have done it without authority? That is all I said about it. Will the Senator answer that question?

Mr. GRAY. No, I will not answer that question, because I do not propose to answer hypothetical questions. I do not know but if the Senator from Massachusetts was in a judicial frame of mind, if he were not so zealous and eager to get his lance at rest and run a course against the Administration and if he were not so willing to take for granted every possible phase which is put upon this question which he thinks is discreditable to the Administration, then I might believe that he would agree with me that it would be decent, at least, when we are considering matters which concern the honor of the Government and its flag, that we should wait until we get official information of all the facts and then address ourselves to them as patriotic Senators of the United States ought to do.

The Senator from Massachusetts has founded all that he has said upon the fact that there had been certain accounts of what has gone on in the Hawaiian Islands and what has been done by this so-called special commissioner of the President upon the statements in the public prints of the day. He has quoted them, or their substance, matters which have been discussed perhaps at every fireside throughout this land, and it seems to me hardly fair—indeed it seems pretty hard lines upon this patriotic American, who is exiled from his country and called upon to perform the high duties of his station in a foreign land, that he should not be allowed to have in him the sentiments and opinions which patriotic Americans at home entertain, and when he expresses himself in the freedom of intercourse, which it is his characteristic to observe to the representatives of the press—if that indeed be an authentic interview—that he should be called to account here in the Senate of the United States by those who knew and served with him; who know his high standards of duty; who know his intelligence, his ability, his probity, and his thorough Americanism, that he should be denounced here on the faith of that interview as having done something to betray the secrets of the Government which he represents, and all because the Senator from Massachusetts chooses to believe, before the evidence is submitted and anticipating the facts, that some great wrong has been done or is about to be done by the Executive who happens to have been elected by a party opposed to his own.

I never gained my own consent, and I pray God I never shall, to draw the partisan line in a matter which concerns the foreign affairs of this Government, no matter how I may differ with the Executive who, for the time being, wields the authority of the whole people of the United States. Although I believe the policy of annexation which was avowed by Mr. Harrison, the predecessor of Mr. Cleveland, to have been a wrong policy; though I believe it was a mistake to have made that treaty, I never allowed myself to forget that he was the President of the United States and the President of this whole country, and that for the time being he was my President and entitled to fair play, fair treatment, and fair criticism at my hands.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware being asked whether he agreed with all that I said in regard to our minister at Great Britain refused to answer the question. The question was put to him once, twice, and thrice, and he will not say now that everything that I said about that high officer is not entirely true. All that I said was that if he had made a certain statement attributed to him by the foremost Democratic newspaper in the country, he undoubtedly was authorized to make it. That is all I said.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator forgets.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not forget.

Mr. GRAY. I think he does.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misstates.

Mr. GRAY. No, I do not misstate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misstates. Litera scripta manet. Every word I have said is recorded and can not be changed.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will find it in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. And I abide by it. I said that if that representative of this Government had made a communication, he being a man who understood diplomatic usage from long experience here and in the Department of State, he made it being fully authorized to make it, and I added a little pleasantry, that his statement about the President being magnanimous was a statement which every Democrat made ex parte, and the Senator from Delaware replied in the same vein, that every Republican would dissent from it or that I would dissent from it ex parte, or something of that kind. That is all.

The attempt, Mr. President, the wretched failure of an attempt to turn this discussion of a great constitutional question and of the dignity and authority of the Senate and of the usurpation of the power to appoint executive officers, into a personal attack on a member of the Senate, and the attempt to represent, in the teeth of my recorded words, that I had said something about the minister of Great Britain, which I never said and which there was nothing to suggest in what I said, and which when the Senator alluded to it I disclaimed again and again, and which I disclaim now—the Senator will have twenty-four hours to look over it, and I should like to see whether he will repeat the statement again to-morrow when this resolution comes up—I say the attempt is a wretched attempt, and the failure is a wretched failure.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that attempts and failures are inferences, not facts in this case. It depends upon who uses the word "failure" and who uses the word "attempt." I could, if I chose to imitate the manners of the Senator from Massachusetts, use the same words, but I refrain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being objected to, will go over until to-morrow, and be printed.

PROSECUTIONS UNDER ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to offer a resolution, to which I feel sure there will be no objection, and for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to communicate to the Senate the total number of indictments found for violation of the Federal election laws since the year 1870, with the States in which such indictments were found, also the number of convictions and the nature of the punishment inflicted.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PALMER. I suggest that there should be added to the resolution the words "and the expenses of such prosecutions and convictions."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire accepts the amendment, and the resolution will be so modified. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

REVENUE FROM INCOME TAX.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer another resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the amount of revenue collected annually in each State during the time that the income tax law of 1863 was in effect.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PEFFER. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

And the number of persons in each State from whom the income tax was collected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I see no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire modifies his resolution by accepting the amendment. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

CLOSING OF SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to offer a resolution, which I ask may may be read and lie over under the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to rescind an order recently issued requiring that the Senate Chamber be closed to visitors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table at the request of the mover.

USE OF PUBLIC GROUNDS BY KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.

Mr. VOORHEES. A few days ago I introduced a joint resolution, which the Senate adopted, in regard to allowing the use of public grounds in behalf of the Knights of Pythias. I understand exactly a similar resolution has come over from the House of Representatives, having been adopted by that body. I ask the Senate to take up that joint resolution and concur in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the Monument grounds and reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what earthly objection there can be to making this a general power in the Secretary of War? He is a very high officer of the Government, whom we all respect and trust. Every cavalcade or public association of any sort in procession seems obliged to come to Congress for this authority, and when Congress is not in session I suppose the authority can not be obtained. I suggest that the joint resolution be made a general law or general resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to exercise full authority in this matter always and at all times.

I shall not, however, interfere with the resolution now if for any reason the Senator is in a hurry to get it through.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am inclined to think that this subject had better be held specifically in hand and this authority granted to organizations with which we are somewhat familiar. To generalize the question would take in a very extensive scope; how extensive nobody can tell.

Doubtless there will be no organizations but what are meritorious who will ask such permission; but at the same time it seems to me that I should rather have this joint resolution passed as it is, and we can consider hereafter the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts. They are certainly valuable suggestions and I should be glad to act upon them, but I would rather act upon this joint resolution now in the shape in which it is.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar of General Bills and Resolutions is now in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. HILL. I gave notice last week that at this time I should move to take up for consideration what is known as the bill for the repeal of the Federal election law, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and is now on the Calendar of this body. It was suggested in the discussion of last week by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the bill having been introduced by me at the extraordinary session and referred to the Judiciary Committee, it having been reported at that session, and as the minority had not, as the Senator thought, an opportunity to present their views before the committee, the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I briefly explained then how the bill came to be reported at that time. A majority of the committee were present. The only Republican member who was present did not object to the report of the bill at that time. No motion has ever been made for its recommittal from that day to the present. In the mean time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from New York that a motion to proceed to consider is not, under the rules, debatable.

Mr. HILL. I am proceeding by unanimous consent, as I understand, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, of course the Senator will proceed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. In the mean time the House of Representatives has passed a somewhat similar bill, there being very little difference between the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the bill known as the Tucker bill, which has passed the House of Representatives. That bill came here at the same extraordinary session, and, I think, at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts was laid on the table, where it now remains.

The Senator from Massachusetts appealed to me last week that the minority should have an opportunity to submit their views to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I think the minority should have that right, and for the purpose of affording that opportunity I move to take from the table the Tucker bill, so called, and have it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then I propose to move that the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee be also committed to the same committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator to allow his motion to lie over until to-morrow. I should like to submit some remarks on the bill or bills before the proposed reference is made.

Mr. HILL. Under the circumstances I hardly think I can consent. I assumed that the bill was to be referred this morning. I will adopt, however, the suggestion the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] makes to me, that the Tucker bill, so-called, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that my bill may remain here, so that the Senator may make his remarks upon that.

Mr. CULLOM. That will suit me. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HOAR. At the end of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, unless some other Senator wishes to make remarks—which I believe will not be the case—then let the bill of the Senator from New York also go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the bill, the title of which has just been read, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Now, I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, simply for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to submit some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that bill will now be reported by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 412) to repeal Title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, known as the Federal election law.

Mr. CULLOM. I give notice that to-morrow at the earliest opportunity I shall ask the Senate to allow me to submit some remarks upon that bill.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator desire to speak to-morrow?

Mr. CULLOM. To-morrow, unless there be some reason why I should not. I think I shall be ready to speak to-morrow if it shall be then agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Then, let the bill lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

INCREASE OF NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar of General Orders.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 453) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banks.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask that that bill may go over, as the chairman of the committee is not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, if there be no objection, without prejudice?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

WILLIAM E. WOODBRIDGE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 418) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of William E. Woodbridge for compensation for the use by the United States of his invention relating to projectiles, for which letters patent were ordered to issue to him March 25, 1852; which was read.

Mr. GORMAN. This is rather an important bill. There is a very large amount involved in it. I should like to hear the report read, and I should like to hear from the Senator who reported it something in regard to the bill. There have been before former committees some statements about it. It is a matter of great controversy and of a great deal of interest, I have no doubt, to the claimant, but we have rather a thin Senate, and, if the Senator from Connecticut does not object, probably he had better let the bill go over.

Mr. PLATT. Without prejudice?

Mr. GORMAN. Without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senate is now proceeding under Rule IX. Of course, if there be no objection, upon the request of the Senator from Maryland the bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. GORMAN. That will leave the status of the bill the same as it was before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over upon the request of the Senator from Maryland.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 12, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

BRIDGE ACROSS BŒUF RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4414) to amend an act approved September 4, 1890, authorizing the New Orleans, Natchez and Fort Scott Railroad Company to construct two bridges across Bouef River, in Louisiana.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved September 4, 1890, entitled, "An act to authorize the construction of two bridges across Bouef River, Louisiana," be, and is hereby, amended so that the time within which the actual construction of said bridges may be commenced is hereby extended for the period of one year from the date of the approval of this act.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out "Bouef" and insert "Bœuf."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the title will be amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

On motion of Mr. BOATNER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past 12. The call rests with the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 352.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama that it seems to some of us that this is a bill of too much importance to be brought up in the morning hour. It is a bill of such importance, differentiating so much from all other bills for the admission of States, that it ought to have a thorough discussion of the entire facts that bear upon it. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill at some other time when there will be due opportunity given for debate. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Alabama will not insist upon its consideration in the morning hour.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow and the next day be set aside for the consideration of all bills from the Committee on Territories that have been reported and are on the Calendar.

Mr. REED. I do not think that is a fair proposition. Why not confine it to Utah?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will simply say the Utah bill. I have no intention of bringing up any other bill when the persons interested are not here. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow and the next day be set aside for the consideration of the bill H. R. 352, for the admission of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that to-morrow and the next day be set apart for the consideration of the bill for the admission of Utah as a State. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. That will be understood to be after the second morning hour.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then we pass over the committee.

ROBERT TRAVILA.

Mr. HERMANN (when the Committee on War Claims was called). I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 894) for the relief of Robert Travila for loss of carbine in the late war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to settle with and, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, pay to Robert Travila, late of Company K, First United States Cavalry, the sum of $75.60, the amount overcharged him for loss of a carbine.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, from what committee is this bill reported?

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on War Claims, and it is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 894.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will now report.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to have the report on that bill read.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes the payment of $75 to Robert Travila, who at the time of the loss of the carbine (for that is the property for which payment is claimed) was a cavalryman in the service of the United States. The carbine was lost in the Territory of Arizona while the soldier was traveling among the mountain defiles, and was lost without any negligence on the part of the soldier. The carbine was charged up against his pay to the extent of $100, under the law which provides that the loss of a carbine shall be charged for at that rate. The soldier comes before the committee and shows that the carbine was not lost through his negligence or carelessness; that he used due diligence in properly strapping it to his saddle, and that the loss was without any fault on his part. He now asks to be paid the difference between the cost of the carbine and the amount charged against him.

The Chief of Ordnance says that at that time the cost of the carbine was about $25. The same weapons can now be manufactured for about $10.60; but the committee concluded that it would ask for the difference between the original cost, about $25, and the amount charged, which would leave to his credit $75. The showing is quite conclusive that it was due to no negligence on his part. The Government has received the full cost of the carbine and the soldier would receive the balance.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know from the gentleman from Oregon what evidence he has that this carbine was not lost from carelessness. There is no statement here at all but the report of the committee.

Mr. HERMANN. I will answer the gentleman from Texas by saying that the evidence before our committee, in the shape of affidavits, is conclusive——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion I can not hear anything that is said.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will be in order, and gentlemen in the aisles engaged in conversation will please retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, my answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Texas was that ample evidence is before the Committee on War Claims tending to show that this soldier had provided himself with every arrangement by which this carbine was well taken care of, but in passing through the mountain defiles in Arizona the weapon was struck by coming in contact with a rock, was disengaged or loosened from the saddle, and lost in one of those great precipices; so that it was lost without any negligence on his part.

The cost to the Government, as I before stated, was only $25, and the same weapon can now be manufactured for $10.60. This man was charged $100 for the loss of this carbine under a law which provides that that sum shall be deducted from the pay of a soldier in the event of the loss of his weapon through carelessness, but he has proved conclusively that this was not lost through carelessness. The bill has been reported several times in the Senate and it has been on the House Calendar for a long period, but the amount involved being so small, I could not afford to use my right to recognition to call up this bill to the neglect of more important matters, and the consequence has been that this poor fellow has been put off from year to year for the last ten years. I think there can be no question about the propriety of the bill. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 894), and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HERMANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEDERAL COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. CULBERSON (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 108) to fix the times and places for holding the Federal courts in the State and district of Nebraska.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States within and for the State and district of Nebraska shall be held at the times and places following, that is to say:

At Omaha City, on the first Monday in May and the second Monday in November in each year;

At the city of Lincoln, on the third Monday in January in each year;
At the city of Hastings, on the third Monday in April; and
At the city of Norfolk, on the fourth Monday in April of each year.
SEC. 2. That the passage of this act shall not operate so as to change any existing law, except as to the change of time for holding said courts.

The committee recommended an amendment to the bill, adding, in line 10, after the word "year," "and the first Monday in June in each year."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] has an amendment which he desires to offer to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. I can state the amendment. It is to strike out the words "the first Monday in June," and insert "the third Monday in September," so that the provision will read: "At the city of Lincoln on the third Monday of January in each year and the third Monday in September." The committee are willing that this amendment shall be made.

Mr. MERCER. There is no controversy about the amendment. It has been unanimously agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the committee amendment as amended was then adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CULBERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLAIMS FOR CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4568) to revise and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof.

The bill was read.

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of action in the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property, and for the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March 12, 1863, and acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended for two years from and after the passage of this act, including all cases of seizure under said acts, or under color thereof, either before or after June 30, 1865, whether adjudicated by the Secretary of the Treasury or not, and without regard to any statute of limitations or the loyalty of the claimant at the time of seizure.

SEC. 2. That the benefits of the foregoing section be, and the same are hereby, extended to those claimants whose claims have been adversely determined by said court upon the ground of disloyalty; and all suits on claims which have been so rejected shall, on motion of the claimants or their legal representatives, be reinstated on the docket of the Court of Claims and proceeded with according to law: Provided, That no liability of the United States to the parties in interest shall be created by the judgments of the Court of Claims beyond the fund now in the Treasury, realized by the sale of property taken under the provisons of the act to which this is a supplement: And provided further, That in all cases in which claimants trace the proceeds of their property into the Treasury the judgments shall be for the full amount of said proceeds, and the balance of said fund, if any, shall be distributed pro rata among those claimants who shall prove that their property was seized under said acts or under color thereof, but who are unable to trace or identify the proceeds thereof in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure, and one which I think ought not to be considered in the morning hour. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that next Tuesday week be set apart for its consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a bill which not only ought not to be considered in the morning hour, but, which, if it is to be considered at all, ought to be considered under the regular rules of the House. The facilities which those rules afford for the consideration of meritorious measures like this are so well known to the gentleman from Texas that I am sure he can not object to my suggestion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, we want a day set for the consideration of this bill, and we know of no other way to reach it under the rules of the House except in the morning hour.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas helped to make these rules and they are very valuable, and they should be preserved in their integrity and entirety.

Mr. BURROWS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas that, under the rules, he will have no difficulty in obtaining a special order fixing a time for the consideration of a measure of this importance.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am aware of that. I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday week next be set apart for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. REED. I object. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It belongs on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this bill, and I state now that I make this motion for the purpose of having printed in the RECORD the report that I made upon this bill in the last Congress.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's only object is to have his report printed in the RECORD, that may be done by unanimous consent without going into committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, I ask unanimous consent that my report may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes to withdraw the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to know whether consent has been given for the printing of the views of the minority on this bill?

Mr. BOATNER. There is no minority report. The report is unanimous.

Subsequently the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the bill which has gone over on request of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, it is stated that there are no views of the minority in that case. That is true, but the chairman of the committee calls my attention to the fact, which he did not then observe, that the committee at this session adopt the report of the committee submitted at a previous session by the distinguished chairman of the committee. At that time there was a minority report prepared by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], and I ask that, inasmuch as that report is adopted, that the views of the minority submitted at that time be published in the RECORD in connection with the committee report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made so as to allow the views of the minority to be printed.

The report [by Mr. CULBERSON] and the views of the minority are as follows:

House Report No. 1377, Fifty-second Congress, second session.

CLAIMS ARISING UNDER THE CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY ACT.

May 12, 1892—Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary have considered the bill (H. R. 455) in relation to claims arising under the captured and abandoned property act and for the extension of time in which to bring suit, and recommend its passage for the following reason:

A large amount of property in the States in rebellion or insurrection was seized during the war and immediately after the cessation of hostilities, without regard to the ownership of such property, or the political status of its owners, or the possession of the property at the time of the seizure, by the military and other Federal authorities. The seizure and sale of this property were made under the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, known as the captured and abandoned property acts, and other measures amendatory and supplementary thereof.

The law required the property to be sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury to the credit of the property.

The third section of the act of March 12, 1863, under which the bulk of the property was seized, provided as follows:

"Any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property, may at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims, and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, after the deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof."

Under this provision of the statute many suits were instituted in the Court of Claims by persons claiming to be the owners of property seized under the acts referred to, and when the proof required by the statute was made judgment was rendered in their favor and the money paid.

Over $30,000,000 were placed in the Treasury on account of sales of property under the act of March 12, 1863, and other kindred acts.

The amount now on hand of this fund is $10,512,007.96.

The following statement is believed to be substantially correct and will show the whole amount of money received into the Treasury on account of captured and abandoned property and the amounts paid out from time to time:

Whole amount of abandoned and captured property sales		$31,722,466.20
Cost of collecting, sale, and other expenses	$6,551,000.00
Transferred to Freedman's Bureau	243,000.00
Internal-revenue taxes and commercial intercourse fees	1,406,000.00
Released to claimants by Secretaries Chase, Fessenden, and McCulloch	2,550,675.24
		10,750,675.24
Balance covered into Treasury under resolution of March 30, 1872		20,971,790.96
Paid on special acts of relief	$290,906.32
Paid on judgments against Treasury agents	64,557.27
Paid on judgments under act of March 12, 1863	9,833,423.16
Paid by Secretary of the Treasury under act of May 18, 1872	195,896.25
Disbursed for expenses under joint resolution of March 30, 1868	75,000.00
		10,459,783.00
Balance in Treasury		10,512,007.96

It is understood that the application of the ruling of the Supreme Court, in an opinion delivered since this statement was made, to this fund will materially reduce the amount of this balance, but to what extent can not, with the information at hand, be stated with certainty.

The Government has had the use of this money for more than twenty years, and if it is ever to be distributed to its owners some additional legislation is required. Congress, at every session, is asked to permit individual claimants to bring suit in the Court of Claims to establish their rights in this fund. This privilege has been accorded to some and denied to others.

Further legislation is necessary in order to distribute this fund, because the limitation of two years from and after the close of the war in which claimants of this property were required to prefer their claims has long since expired, and there is now no means provided by law by which the claimants of the fund can enforce their rights.

Formerly there was much contention upon the status of this fund in the Treasury, especially that portion of it derived from the sale of property belonging to those who adhered to the rebellion. It is evident from the terms of the act of 1863 that it was not the intention of Congress that the title to the property seized under it should be divested from the loyal owners. They were allowed two years from and after the close of the war in which to prefer their claims to the property, and because no provision was made by which persons who had been disloyal could prefer their claims in the property and enforce their rights, it was contended that the seizure and sale of so much of this property as belonged to disloyal persons worked a divesture of title and absolutely transferred the proceeds to the Government. On the other hand, it was contended that such seizure and sale of property of disloyal persons did not divest the title of the original owners, and that the fund derived from such sales was placed in the Treasury to be kept there to await the determination of the Government whether it should be returned to the owners of the property or not.

Your committee believe that this contention has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Klein vs. The United States, reported in 13 Wallace, page 128, and the following quotations are made from the report of the case:

"1. That it was not the intention of Congress, by the enactment of that statute, that the title to property seized under it should be divested from the loyal owners.

"2. That the proceeds of the property should go into the Treasury without change of ownership.

"3. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who though then hostile might subsequently become loyal.

"4. That it was for the Government itself to determine whether those proceeds should be restored to the owner or not.

"5. That the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, with restoration of rights of property, and particularly that of July 4, 1868, was a decision on the part of the Government which decided affirmatively the right of all the owners of such property to the proceeds thereof in the Treasury; and the restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned.

"6. And that 'the Government constituted itself the trustee for those who by that act were declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and for those whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.'"

And in its opinion the court uses this language:

"That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act.

We have already seen that those articles which became by the simple fact of capture the property of the captor, as ordnance, munitions of war, and the like, or in which third parties acquired rights which might be made absolute by decree, as ships and other vessels captured as prize, were expressely excepted from the operation of the act; and it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal, appears probable from the circumstances that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it, while there is no trace in the statute book of intention to divest ownership of private property not excepted from the effect of this act otherwise than by proceedings for confiscation.

"It is thus seen that, except as to property used in actual hostilities, as mentioned in the first section of the act of March 12, 1863, no titles were divested in the insurgent States unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings. The Government recognized to the fullest extent the humane maxims of the modern law of nations, which exempt private property of noncombatant enemies from capture as booty of war; even the law of confiscation was sparingly applied. The cases were few indeed in which the property of any not engaged in actual hostilities was subjected to seizure and sale.

"We conclude, therefore, that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested from the original owner. It was for the Government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decided that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. * * * The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent, 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfillment."

And then the court adds this strong language:

"To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less cruel and astounding than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom."

It will be observed that the court decides that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exception of property used in actual hostilities, was in no case divested from the original owner.

The question therefore arises whether the Government ever determined that the proceeds of the sales of property under the captured and abandoned property acts which belonged to disloyal persons should be restored to them.

Whatever of occasion for dispute there may have been upon this question at one time, there seems to be none now.

Under the act of July, 1862, known as the confiscation act, the President was authorized at any time thereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in rebellion in any State or part thereof pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he should deem expedient for the public welfare.

On the 8th day of December, 1863, the President issued his proclamation, in which he referred to the act of 1863, relating to captured and abandoned property, and offered pardon and amnesty, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves and property to which third persons had acquired rights, to all persons who had participated in the rebellion who would take an oath to support the Constitution and the laws. Certain classes were excepted from the benefits of pardon and amnesty under that proclamation.

On the 29th of May, 1865, another proclamation was issued, extending pardon and amnesty, with a full restoration of all property rights, except as to slaves, etc., to all persons who had participated in the rebellion. A similar oath was required, and fourteen classes of persons were excepted from the benefits of the proclamation.

On the 7th of September, 1867, another similar proclamation of pardon and amnesty was issued, which reduced the excepted classes from fourteen to seven. Finally on the 4th day of July, 1868, a proclamation was issued by the President extending pardon and amnesty to all, with some exceptions, who had participated in the rebellion, with restoration to all rights of property except in slaves, and on the 25th of December, 1868, without exception, unconditionally, and without reservation. No oath was required.

The legal effect of the proclamations to which reference has been made was to wipe out all disability by reason of disloyalty and to present the offender before the law as a new man, as innocent as if he had never been charged with treason. These proclamations also serve to show that the President of the United States, authorized by the Constitution and by statute, determined to restore the proceeds of the sales of captured and abandoned property belonging to disloyal owners to them upon condition that they would comply with the requirements of the proclamations. Those who complied with the conditions of those proclamations were instantly rehabilitated as citizens, restored to equality before the law, and to all rights of property. In the language of the Supreme Court before quoted:

"The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decided that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. * * * The restoration of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property became the absolute right of the persons pardoned, on application within two years from the close of the war."

Those who had failed to avail themselves of the proffered pardon extended by the proclamations containing conditions (if there were any such) were covered and embraced by the proclamation of July 4, 1868, which extended pardon and amnesty to all, without condition, with full restoration to property rights.

Your committee submit the following, taken from the decision of the Supreme Court in Padelford's case, reported in 9 Wallace:

"In the case of Garland this court held the effect of a pardon to be such "that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;" and in the case of Armstrong's foundry we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States. It follows that at the time of the seizure of the petitioner's property he was purged of whatever offense against the laws of the United States he had committed by the acts mentioned in the findings and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred. It follows, further, that if the property had been seized before the oath was taken, the faith of the Government was pledged to its restoration upon the taking of the oath in good faith. We can not doubt that the petitioner's right to the property in question at the time of the seizure was perfect and that it remains perfect, notwithstanding the seizure.

"But it has been suggested that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully; and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, the petitioner is without remedy in the Court of Claims, unless proof is made that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed to him. If, in other respects, the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and of the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit, and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own."

But for the bar made by the statute of limitations of two years it seems that all persons, loyal and those who had been disloyal, might prefer their claims to this property, and upon proof of their right to the property obtain the proceeds.

Pardon and amnesty relieved claimants of captured and abandoned property from proving their adhesion to the Government of the United States during the late war.

The following is the whole of the opinion of the court in Pargoud's case, 13 Wallace:

"We have recently decided, in the case of Armstrong against the United States, that the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, granting pardon and amnesty unconditionally and without reservation to all who participated directly or indirectly in the late rebellion, relieves claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late civil war. It was therefore unnecessary to prove such adhesion or personal pardon for taking part in the rebellion against the United States. The judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition is reversed."

It follows, from what has been said, that this fund in the Treasury does not belong to the Government, but is the property of citizens of the United States, and held in trust for them by the Government. Ought the Government longer refuse to distribute this fund among the owners of it?

Your committee believe that it is true, as alleged, that the bulk of this fund yet remaining in the Treasury belongs to persons who participated in the late rebellion, but in view of the fact that under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, as declared by the Supreme Court, the restoration of the proceeds of this property became the absolute right of the persons pardoned, the former political status of the owner can afford no just reason for withholding the money.

No laches can be imputed to this class of claimants.

The statute authorized claims to the proceeds of sales of captured and abandoned property to be preferred in the Court of Claims at any time within two years from the suppression of the rebellion. When was the rebellion suppressed? That became a question for the courts, in order to apply the statute of limitation. In December, 1869, the Supreme Court decided, in Anderson vs. United States (9 Wallace, page 56), that the rebellion was suppressed on the 20th of August, 1866, the date of the President's proclamation declaring the final and complete suppression of the rebellion. The limitation of the right to commence suit therefore expired on the 20th day of August, 1868.

Some claimants who had participated in the rebellion filed suits in the Court of Claims before the bar of limitation was complete, but a large majority of that class of claimants did not commence suit, because it was generally understood that, notwithstanding the proclamations of pardon and amnesty, the claimant would be required to prove his loyalty before he could have a standing in the court.

It was a matter of doubt among the members of the legal fraternity as to what effect would be given by the Supreme Court to the proclamations of pardon and amnesty. In 1869 the Supreme Court decided that the necessity of proving loyalty in order to recover the proceeds of captured and abandoned property had been removed by the proclamations of pardon and amnesty.

This decision came too late to benefit that class of claimants. The limitation had already expired and the bar was complete.

In view of the law and the facts as above stated, your committee deem it unwise for the Government, and unjust to the claimants of this fund for Congress to decline longer to make some provision by which they may establish and enforce their rights.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1377, part 2, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

May 13, 1892.—Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ezra B. Taylor, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

The undersigned, differing with the majority of the committee, beg leave to state their reasons for such dissent, and as the views of the minority of the committee upon a like bill in the Fifty-first Congress were drawn by one of the undersigned and expresses our present views, we adopt that statement, to wit:

"The history of Congressional legislation and judicial decision touching the subject of captured and abandoned property is correctly given by the majority in their report; still it does not follow that the bill should pass.

"By statute of March 3, 1863, any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned and captured property might, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims, and on proof of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given aid or comfort to the rebellion, receive the residue of said proceeds, after the deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property, and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof.

"Under the provisions of that statute many suits were successfully prosecuted, and said claims were paid; but the two years within which claims were to be preferred expired, leaving a large number of claims outstanding. This bill is to give further time for preferring such claims. The fact is, that the outstanding claims were and are held almost exclusively by men who could not prove that they had 'never given aid or comfort to the rebellion.' The subsequent decision of the Supreme Court, however, construed the President's proclamation of pardon and amnesty, of July 4, 1868, as restoring such men to loyalty and to all the rights which loyal citizens were entitled to under the act of March 12, 1863. That is, they, thinking themselves to have been disloyal in rebellion, and as having given aid and comfort to the rebellion, preferred no claim until too late; but finding after the expiration of two years after the suppression of the rebellion, that they were technically loyal, now ask Congress to remove the legal bar to their claims.

"They had their day in court, but did not avail themselves of it by reason of their ignorance of law, which excuses no one, and by reason of their knowledge of their disloyalty. The limitation of actions is a necessary and wholesome provision of law, not necessarily inequitable or obnoxious to the sense of common justice. It may, however, be removed or extended in proper cases. The only question to be considered in regard to this bill is whether it presents a proper and equitable case for the removal of the limitation, which took effect nearly twenty years ago.

"Legally the parties in interest in this bill have no standing in court. Ought they to be given such standing?

"Their property was taken by the United States and sold, and the proceeds thereof are in the Treasury.

"They were in fact in arms against the Government from which they now demand 'justice.' Considering their numbers and influence, it will not be denied that they did great injury to that Government, its property, and citizens. They caused it more expense and loss, doubtless, than the amount of the property covered by this bill. Their offense was serious and the wrong done the Government by them great. They have been dealt generously with by the United States Government, but the undersigned are unable to appreciate their claims for further consideration as presented by this bill.

"Again, the lapse of time since the transactions to be investigated by the Court of Claims under this bill, and the nature of the transactions and the circumstances surrounding them, will inevitably, as we think, result in findings of the court largely in excess of the amount in the Treasury arising from the sale of abandoned and captured property, and will call for unlimited subsequent appropriations by Congress.

"E. B. TAYLOR."

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL, BUTLER FLATS, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. WISE. I call up the bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established, on or near Butler Flats, entrance to the lower harbor of New Bedford, Mass., a light and fog-signal station, at a cost not to exceed $45,000.

Mr. WISE. It is only necessary, I think, for me to state to the House that the chairman of the Light-House Board has reported that this work is indispensable. His letter is at the desk and can be read if desired.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to have the letter read.

Mr. WISE. Then I call for the reading of the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1893.

SIR: Replying to your note of to-day to the chairman of the Light-House Board, I have the honor to inform you that the board considers the light-house at Butler Flats, Massachusetts, as being indispensable to navigation and as one which should be built at the earliest possible moment.

Respectfully yours,

F. A. MEHAN,
Captain of Engineers, U. S. Army, Engineer Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE D. WISE,
Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce if it is to be the policy of his committee to recommend the construction of no light-houses except such as are indispensable.

Mr. WISE. We have determined that we will recommend the construction of none of these works except those which are indispensable—which are so reported by the Light-House Board.

Mr. SAYERS. And this bill contains no appropriation?

Mr. WISE. No, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. All right.

Mr. WISE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 156) for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station near Butler Flats, New Bedford, Mass., had directed him to report the same back with a recommendation that it be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ENGINEERS, ETC., ON STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. WISE. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], in order that he may call up a bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I call up the bill (H. R. 411) to require steam vessels of the United States, of 1,000 tons or more, to have one engineer and helper on watch in their engine rooms while under way, and to require all steam vessels of the United States, continuously under steam for more than ten hours, to carry two licensed engineers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every steam vessel of the United States, of 1,000 tons or more, shall at all times, while under way, have one engineer and one helper on watch in the engine room, and every steam vessel of the United States that is under steam continuously for more than ten hours shall carry two licensed engineers.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MALLORY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 411) entitled "A bill to require steam vessels of the United States, of one thousand tons or more to have one engineer and helper on watch in their engine rooms while under way, and to require all steam vessels of the United States, continuously under steam for more than ten hours, to carry two licensed engineers," having carefully considered the same, respectfully report and recommend the passage of said bill, with the following amendments, viz:

In line 7 of the bill, between the words "hours" and "shall," insert the word "daily."

After the word "engineers," in line 8 of the bill, insert the following, viz: "Provided, however, That the last clause of this act shall not be construed to apply to ferryboats or to steam vessels whose usual or regular employment does not exceed ten hours daily."

Amend the title of said bill by striking out the word "continuously," in line 4 of the title.

Strike out the word "all," in line 3 of the title, and insert the word "certain" in lieu thereof.

In line 5 of the bill, between the words "helper" and "on," insert the words "or oiler."

In line 6 of the bill, after the word "steam," insert the words "and is navigated."

In line 7 of the bill strike out the word "continuously."

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes merely to require that all vessels of 1,000 tons or more shall carry an engineer and helper or oiler; and it also provides that all vessels which are navigated daily under steam for more than ten hours shall carry two licensed engineers. There is a proviso to the effect that the last clause of this act shall not be construed to apply to ferryboats or to steam vessels whose usual and regular employment does not exceed ten hours daily.

The committee having considered the bill has reported the amendments which have been read, which I think are all that have been suggested by the Treasury Department. I hold in my hand the report of the Supervising Inspector. It is somewhat lengthy, but if any gentleman desires to hear it I am perfectly willing it shall be read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does this bill apply to steam vessels on our inner waters—our rivers?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. It applies to all steam vessels of 1,000 or more tons?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it recommended by the officers of the Treasury Department?

Mr. MALLORY. The report from the Department is rather a peculiar one. It is not in direct terms a recommendation; but it suggests the amendments which the committee have reported.

Mr. BALDWIN. Is not this matter already provided for by laws of most of the States?

Mr. MALLORY. No laws of any State can control this question; it is a matter of Federal law.

Mr. BALDWIN. I supposed that, with reference to the chain of lakes, for instance, a law similar to this was already in force.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read with the amendments proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every steam vessel of the United States, of 1,000 tons or more, shall at all times, while under way, have one engineer and one helper or oiler on watch in the engine room, and every steam vessel of the United States that is under steam and is navigated for more than ten hours daily, shall carry two licensed engineers: Provided, however, That the last clause of this act shall not be construed to apply to ferryboats or to steam vessels whose usual or regular employment does not exceed ten hours daily.

Mr. MALLORY. If there is no desire on the part of any gentleman to discuss this matter, I move the adoption of the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that is done I wish to make an inquiry. Is the proviso in the last clause of this bill clear enough as to what it refers to?

Mr. MALLORY. I think so.

Mr. DINGLEY. The first part of the bill provides that every steam vessel of 1,000 tons or more shall have one engineer and one helper on watch, and that every steam vessel navigated for more than ten hours daily shall carry two licensed engineers. Is it the intention of the committee to confine the proviso to steam vessels navigated for not more than ten hours daily?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; except ferryboats and vessels which may be employed not more than ten hours a day, which are wholly excepted.

Mr. LOUD. The latter portion of that bill is already the law, is it not?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Are these vessels not now required to have two licensed engineers?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir. This provision, I will state, is suggested by the Supervising Inspector.

Mr. SIMPSON. What is the idea of compelling these vessels to have a helper on watch?

Mr. MALLORY. Well, it is necessary to have some person who is thoroughly competent to run the engine or to stop it if necessary in case of the temporary absence of the engineer. If the engineer should be away from his post at any time, it is essential to have some one who knows enough about running the engine to at least stop it if necessary.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is it not a fact that very few of the vessels on the Great Lakes carry this additional helper?

Mr. MALLORY. The law says "a helper or an oiler." It is not necessary to have a helper if an oiler is employed. It is a fact that the large Atlantic steamers, and I suppose the Pacific steamers also, carry two licensed engineers now.

Mr. DINGLEY. All ocean steamships do.

Mr. SIMPSON. On the Great Lakes there are many large steamers that do not carry a helper at all. This will force an additional expense upon them.

Mr. MALLORY. This says "helper or oiler." They are not obliged to have this additional helper if they employ an oiler, and most of the steamboats do employ an oiler. This is the suggestion of the Supervising Inspector of the Treasury Department, who says in his communication to the committee:

> In order to prevent any misconstruction of the law in this respect, I should advise that the language of the proposed law be amended by adding, after the word "helper," the words "or oiler."

which recommendation we adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendments recommended by the committee be adopted.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT CUMMINGS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. McRAE (when the Committee on the Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 356) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reserve from sale certain land in the abandoned Fort Cummings military reservation, and for other purposes.

I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to withdraw from sale so much of the land of the abandoned Fort Cummings military reservation, in the Territory of New Mexico, as may be necessary to secure perpetually for public use the spring upon said reservation; the land to be reserved, as aforesaid, to embrace not only that upon which the spring is situated, but such other portions for right of way as may be necessary to secure to the public the right to have all the advantages of the spring aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company a license to so much of the water of said spring as may be necessary for the operation of the road of said company, and to grant to said company a right of way for a pipe from said spring to the road of said company by the most direct line; to be located under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That said right of way shall not exceed 40 feet in width, and when the same is located the land covered by the right of way shall be withdrawn from entry, and after due appraisal shall be paid for by said company and be dedicated to the right of way aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the license aforesaid shall continue as long as the existence thereof may be deemed not injurious to the public interest by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall at all times have the right to regulate the quantity of water to be used by said company, so as not to deprive the public of the benefits of the dedication to public use hereinabove made. Upon the cessation of the license the right of way for the pipe line aforesaid shall revert to the United States, upon refunding by the United States the sum of the appraised price thereof which may have been paid to the United States by said company under the previous provisions of this act, and Congress reserves the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. McRAE. In explanation of the bill I ask the Clerk to read the report made by Mr. GRESHAM.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 356) "to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reserve from sale certain land in the abandoned Fort Cummings military reservation, and for other purposes," have had the same under consideration and report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The first section of this bill authorizes the reservation for the use of the public of a large and valuable spring of water on the abandoned Fort Cummings military reservation, in New Mexico, with a reservation of such land for right of way as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior to secure to the public the right to have all the advantages of the spring.

Sections 2 and 3 of this bill authorize the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company to use water from the spring for the operation of its trains, under certain conditions and reservations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

In 1881, and when the military was still in occupation, the War Department permitted the railroad company to develop this then unused spring, which the company did by walling it up and placing a pump therein, whereby the water was taken to a large trough used by the post, and the overflow pipe from the trough connected with the water tank at the company's station some miles distant, and used there by the company in the running of its trains. After the abandonment of Fort Cummings by the military, the reservation was turned over to the Interior Department for survey and sale, in accordance with the general laws upon that subject. This spring of water has a large capacity, and is the only available spring for a distance of some 30 miles. Its use to the public and to the railroad, freed from private right, was essential.

In the last Congress a bill was passed by the Senate and favorably reported by the House committee (as per copy of the committee's report herewith) which is identical with the pending bill. The bill was prepared by Senator WHITE of Louisiana, a member of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, after careful consideration. His purpose was to dedicate this spring to public use and to permit the railroad company to continue, as it has for years past, to use the surplus or overflowed water therefrom, carried through the pipe line to its station some miles distant. The road named is a part of the Atchison system.

The loss of use of this water would seriously interfere with the operation of the trains of the railroad company. The company originally offered to buy this spring and use the water therefrom in connection with the public, but the Senate and House committees of the last Congress concurred in the proposition that the water should not be sold to anyone, but continue, as under present conditions, dedicated to the use of the public and to the company.

The suggestion of the Department's report, that the particular subdivision on which the spring is located should be named in the bill, is objectionable, because the spring is widely known in that section of the country, is readily identified, and if the survey should be found erroneous, so as to locate it upon some other subdivision, the act would be ineffectual.

The further suggestion made by the Department that the company's pipe line should name the termini, is made without understanding of the facts. The pipe line runs through several miles of public land after it leaves the line of the reservation, before it reaches the railroad station and water tank. The conditions sought to be perpetuated by the bill have continued for years without complaint from any source, and for the continuing benefit of the public and the company. The act proposes to leave that situation unchanged for the continuing benefit of all concerned.

Mr. McRAE. I think the report is sufficiently explicit, and move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 356, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

METHOD OF ACCOUNTING, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time a bill for reference to the Joint Commission, and also that the Commission have leave to report upon the same at any time.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4610) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, this bill will be referred to the Joint Commission, with leave to report at any time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MUTCHLER.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, 8,000 copies, of which number 2,000 copies shall be delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, which shall include 50 copies to be bound in full morocco, to be delivered to the family of the deceased, and of those remaining 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to have engraved and printed a portrait of the said William Mutchler to accompany the said eulogies.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the House concurrent resolution to print the eulogies delivered in Congress on the Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of same is $2,625.

The report was adopted.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I send up a resolution providing for the printing of certain documents asked for by the Committee on Ways and Means relative to the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution submitted by the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed of the document entitled "Imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States during the years 1890 to 1893, with the rate and amount of duty collected," prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, for the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives; 4,000 copies for the use of the House, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics.

The report of the Committee on Printing was read. It recommended the adoption of the resolution, and stated that the estimated cost of the printing called for was $1,016.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF NORTH CAPITOL STREET.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, this being the second Monday in the month, which under the rules is accorded to the Committee on the District of Columbia for business reported from that commiteee, I claim the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct, and he will indicate what bill he desires to call up.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to open and grade North Capitol street from T street to the Soldiers' Home, and are hereby authorized and directed to condemn, in the manner provided by law prior to March 2, 1893, for the condemnation of land in the District of Columbia, such of the lands of the Prospect Hill Cemetery and of Annie E. Barbour as may be necessary for the extension of said street, and the amount of money necessary to pay the judgment of condemnation and the cost of grading is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That one-half of the said sum shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That this appropriation shall be immediately available.

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 14, after the word "act," insert "but the cost of grading shall not exceed $10,000."

Mr. HEARD. I ask for the reading of the report of the District Commissioners——

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 146) to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home, with Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], who reported this bill and who is familiar with its details.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this bill is very short, and its object is very fully explained on its face. It is intended to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home. This street, in its course to the north, runs up against property owned by the Prospect Hill Cemetery. This bill is intended simply to open this street through that cemetery, and to extend it on to the Soldiers' Home. There will only be a few hundred feet through that cemetery. There is no objection upon the part of anyone, so far as I am informed.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand that this street will go through a cemetery?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; it will go through this cemetery the length of a square.

Mr. KILGORE. Does this cemetery belong to any church or association?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It belongs to an incorporated company known as the Prospect Hill Cemetery.

Mr. KILGORE. Have they assented to this proposition?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They have assented to it. They have never used the portion of the cemetery for burial purposes where the street will run. It will cut off a few thousand feet to the west of the street—I do not remember the exact quantity, and that part of the cemetery property will be put upon the market for sale by the cemetery company. The proposed action will leave the property to the east of the street, however, still to be used for cemetery purposes.

Mr. KILGORE. Are there to be any condemnation proceedings under this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In the general law there is a provision for condemnation proceedings and payment to the owners of the price of property taken. That is provided for if there are any damages, and they would be paid; but in the law as it now stands the Commissioners, or the jury of condemnation, are directed to take into consideration the value of the property that is left. That is to be considered. One is to be set off against the other; and it is not believed that it will amount to anything one way or the other. The limitation put in the bill for grading amounts to $10,000.

Mr. KILGORE. What will be the distance of this street that will have to be opened? What length will the new work be?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is about two blocks, and would be 400 or 500 feet—say 600 feet.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand it fixes the limit in the appropriation, and that limit is $10,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is to be paid for, one-half out of the District revenues and one-half out of the Treasury.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, if it should turn out that it would cost $100,000 instead of $10,000, they would have to go along and complete it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They could just use the $10,000 provided.

Mr. KILGORE. But it would be a work already commenced, and it would take another bill; and they would come in here with one.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They could not do that without coming back to the House of Representatives for authority.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. I want to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas, that under the general law the Commissioners apportion the amounts to the different streets that they regard as necessary to be improved; and according to the report of the Commissioners in this case they have set apart the sum of $10,000 for the improvement of this street, and they think it will be sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. KILGORE. Is the District of Columbia to pay the entire $10,000?

Mr. HEARD. No, sir. One-half is to be paid out of the Treasury, as in every case of condemnation proceedings for street improvements in the city.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have already set apart $10,000 for this purpose?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; they have not appropriated it to this purpose, but they recommend that amount.

Mr. HEARD. I should have said that they recommended that apportionment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The necessity for this bill, if the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. SAYERS. Hold on a minute; I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield for any inquiry.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, I understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that $10,000 has already been set aside for this purpose.

Mr. HEARD. I corrected that, and say that the amount was recommended by the Commissioners in their report. They have recommended the setting aside of $10,000 for this purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. So that no appropriation has been made for this purpose.

Mr. HEARD. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. None at all.

Mr. SAYERS. Did the committee inquire into what would probably be the actual cost of constructing this street?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir. The estimate put upon it by the District Commissioners is $10,000, and they say that it will not exceed that sum.

Mr. HEARD. That is correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say——

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to a question.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I understand that a provision in this bill, which I have not had an opportunity to read, is for the appraisement of this property and the assessment of damages.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The law provides for that. There is no provision of that kind in this bill, if the gentleman will look at it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say as to the passage of this bill——

Mr. GOODNIGHT. This is the question I wish to ask the gentleman. Does the bill provide that in the estimation of the amount of damages they may be offset by the benefit? Is there any provision in this bill which prevents the offsetting of damages by benefits?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all. I have just said that.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Well, I think there ought to be. That is the reason why I think the bill is at fault. There can be no benefit at all to that cemetery property.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I think not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; and I will tell you why. The opening of this street through the cemetery will cut off a piece of land to the west containing, say, 50,000 feet, where there have been no burials, and which can then be put upon the market for residence purposes. The cemetery will be benefited to that extent, because that piece of land will be made available in that way, and the cemetery people do not object to this bill.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I understand that they do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I have it from them that they do not. That is all I know about it. Perhaps the gentleman has other information.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. This part of the cemetery will be cut off by the opening of this street and it will be done for the purpose of benefiting the property beyond and for no other purpose, and the part cut off from the cemetery will be so small that it can not be sold.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken as to that.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I so understood from the gentleman near me [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has told me that the cemetery people do not object.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have that question settled now. My colleague [Mr. BARTHOLDT] did tell the gentleman from Tennessee that, and he also told me that the cemetery people did not object. Now, I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT] to say that he has told him that they do object.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. No; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has not stated that to me, but others have.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] applied to me and to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] for a hearing for the cemetery people on this subject, but subsequently he came and told us that they did not desire a hearing.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] stated to me this morning that there was no objection to this bill on the part of the cemetery people.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Yes; I understand that. He has told me that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Provided that the bill retained its original form.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly; that there was no objection to the bill as it now reads.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Some of the people connected with the cemetery did complain last year.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, they did object a year ago.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I have not had any talk with them upon the subject to-day nor during this session.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, their objection has been removed; so I am informed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. Now, as to the necessity for this bill, it provides a means of getting to the Soldiers' Home by a street railroad which runs directly up North Capitol street. At present you can not get to the Soldiers' Home without taking a carriage or other such means of conveyance. The street railroad at present stops on North Capitol street at the line of the cemetery grounds, and this bill simply authorizes the opening of the street through the grounds; and when it is opened the railroad will extend its line up to the Soldiers' Home, thus affording a cheap mode of transportation for the people.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, from such information as it is possible to obtain from this report, that the purposes of this bill are simply to enable the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to construct its road to the Soldiers' Home as cheaply as possible to itself, at the expense of the Government. It is stated in this report that the $10,000 will not grade the street 40 feet in width, but that it will do just about enough to permit the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to construct two tracks. Now, unless there is some estimate of the exact cost of the construction of this road and the complete grading of the street to the full width of the part of it that runs through the city, I do not think we ought to make this appropriation, simply for the purposes which I claim will be effected by this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can not see the force of the gentleman's argument. It certainly will be a matter of great convenience to the public to have a street railroad opened up to the Soldiers' Home. I do not understand that we are legislating for the benefit of this railroad company at all. North Capitol street is one of the main thoroughfares of this city, a very beautiful drive, running directly north from this Capitol building. The street at present stops at the cemetery grounds, and now when it is proposed to open it through those grounds somebody comes here and says that it is for the benefit of the railroad company. The railroad company is not asking this at all.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. What I say is that the proposed appropriation does not undertake to grade that street to a sufficient width for the passage of vehicles. It simply limits the grading to 40 feet in width, and says that the appropriation will probably not permit more.

Mr. HEARD. Does not the gentleman know that 40 feet is greater than the existing width of the roadway in most of the streets of the city?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I understand that; but I am speaking of the width of North Capitol street in the city. You do not propose to continue it at its full width.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The street will be opened 40 feet wide; and this appropriation, the Commissioners say, will be sufficient to open it to that extent. Now, when the gentleman makes the point that the existing part of that street in the city is more than 40 feet wide, and that therefore we ought to appropriate enough to open it up to the same width all the way through, I think his argument is unfair. It is not necessary to open the street wider than 40 feet, because that gives sufficient width for present purposes; and if there is incidental benefit to property holders by the opening of this street, why, that is only fair and legitimate.

Mr. HEARD. Has not the fact been shown before the committee that the persons owning property beyond this cemetery have dedicated land for this improvement for a distance of 1,800 feet, in view of the benefit which they are to derive from the opening of the street?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is true. The owners of the property on North Capitol street beyond the Soldiers' Home have, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] has stated, dedicated property for street purposes for the space of 1,800 feet. Hence the Government will be put to no expense for that if this proposition be now accepted and this street be now extended through that cemetery.

An inquiry was made a moment ago by my friend from Kentucky as to the quantity of ground which will be left west of North Capitol street to be put upon the market if this street is opened under this bill. The quantity left will be 160,000 feet, which can be put upon the market at once at an enhanced value by reason of this street being opened.

Mr. KILGORE. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that we should afford all facilities for opening streets and constructing street-car lines. I do not wish to criticise any effort on the part of any street-railway company for such extension of their lines, because the public is thereby accommodated. But when it becomes necessary to make an appropriation for opening a street, to raise and level it, largely in the interest of a street-car line, another question is presented. It strikes me this company should contribute something itself for this improvement. The proposition here, as I understand, is to make an appropriation of $10,000, $5,000 of which is to come out of the funds of the District at a time when we have not the money.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, we have plenty of money in this District; there is no trouble about that.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is some equity in the suggestion of my friend from Texas; but the law requires that these street-railroad companies shall grade the streets which they use in this way and shall lay concrete or such other pavements as may be required by the orders of the Commissioners not only between the tracks, but for two feet beyond the outside rails of the double track.

Mr. KILGORE. That they do in consideration of the right of way?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir. Thus the public obtains a splendid concrete driveway not only the width of the two tracks, but two feet beyond on each side without any expense to the city.

Mr. KILGORE. But any person driving has to get out of the way of the street cars when they come along.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Of course, persons using the road do not want to be run over by the street cars.

Mr. Chairman, I presume there is no objection to this bill——

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will hear the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The amendment I propose is to strike out in line 16 the words "one-half of," so as to provide that no part of this expenditure shall be contributed by the United States Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If there be no objection, I ask that the general debate on this bill be closed. After the general debate is closed the bill will be open to amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the general debate on this bill will be considered as closed.

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my amendment, if adopted, would be to require that this payment of $10,000 be made entirely from the revenues of the District of Columbia, instead of half from the District revenues and half from the United States Treasury. It was suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] that the United States Government is at this time short of revenues and has no extra $5,000 lying around to expend for grading tracks for the street railways of this city. In response to that suggestion, another was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], that the District of Columbia has an abundance of money. Putting the two together, and keeping in mind the fact, which ought not to be disregarded, that the people of the United States have no interest in this street or railway, or in condemning a right of way through the cemetery mentioned in the report of the District Committee, I think, if this bill is to go through, it should be so framed that the burden shall rest where it properly belongs.

Let me say now, Mr. Chairman, that I for one am opposed to the policy which has been followed so long, that of compelling the people of the United States to pay one-half of the taxes of the people of the District of Columbia. How long that policy will be continued I know not; that is for Congress to say. It will not be continued or extended with my concurrence. Whenever this question arises and whenever I shall have an opportunity to cast a vote upon the subject, I shall vote for excepting the people of my own district and the people of the United States at large from the burden of paying expenses properly belonging to the District of Columbia.

In every city of this Union, whenever it becomes necessary to open or widen a street, the city pays, if there be payment made beyond what is contributed by individual citizens and property owners along the line. Nowhere else within the Union is it the policy to pay with general public funds for local improvements of this character.

If this street is to be opened in the city of Washington or District of Columbia, let it be done as it would be if in New York, St. Louis, Chicago, or anywhere else. So far as these improvements for municipal purposes go, so far as the grading to prepare the roadbed for the street railway is concerned, if the expense is to be borne by the public at all, let it be borne by the public immediately concerned and interested in it. Do not involve the people of the whole United States in an expenditure in which they have no interest whatever.

Mr. Chairman, I am willing to extend every facility to the public; but if a bill of this character is to pass, let it pass with those concerned footing the expenses. While the part that would fall upon the people I represent would be small the principle is the same, and in a little time we shall have a bill before the House appropriating five or six millions of dollars for the annual expenses of the District of Columbia, one-half, perhaps, to be borne by the people of the District and one-half to be paid by the people of the United States at large.

I give notice now, Mr. Chairman, that I shall oppose the half-and-half policy at every opportunity and by every means within my power. It shall make no difference to me in that course whether it be popular or unpopular; whether approval or criticism shall follow or attend. I know that it is right for a man representing a people already burdened with taxation, who have to contribute to all sorts of local expenditures in their own cities and towns in their own States, and have to contribute their portion to all needed expenditures of the General Government, to oppose compelling them to pay also half the taxes of the good people of the District of Columbia. It is burden enough upon the people to support the General Government and their own State and local governments. They should not be required to pay half of the expenditures of the people of the District of Columbia, in the way of taxation.

Now, then, while perhaps this is not exactly the time to try the main issue, there is fair opportunity to test the principles of taxation involved, and so I offer for consideration the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was in hopes that the gentleman from Missouri would not have proposed that amendment on this bill. If he desires to correct the law which has been in force for a great many years, taxing the revenues of the District of Columbia one-half and the revenues of the United States one-half for the support of the government of this District, it seems to me he ought to make it on the general law when it is before the House for consideration, and not on the first special bill presented to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have but five minutes; the gentleman can get recognition in his own right. However, I will yield to him for a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask simply this: This improvement, I believe, is outside of the city of Washington?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is. It is beyond the boundary, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is beyond the boundary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did we not pass an act last Congress expressly providing that improvements hereafter made beyond the limits of the city of Washington should be borne by the District?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. This comes in conflict with that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say that it does. The gentleman, however, can refer to the law; or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] can perhaps inform him on the subject.

The policy suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE

ARMOND], providing that the District of Columbia should pay all of the expenditures for the District, ought to be more fully discussed than we can discuss it here under the five-minutes rule. I undertake to say that the Government is not paying more now than it ought to pay. The Government, in other words, owns fully one-half of the property in the District of Columbia, and it ought to be assessed on that property that it owns just as the individuals are assessed on the value of their property; and if you are going to make an examination of the matter, and tax each party according to its value, the Government, it will be found, is not paying now more than its proportion of the taxes in the District.

The gentleman from Missouri made this fight in the last Congress. He made it on an appropriation bill, and I hope my friend will not now insist on the amendment to this bill. It is a small one, and relates only to one little appropriation. Let him make it on the general appropriation bill, and if the change is then made in that regard, why it will be applicable to this bill as to all other appropriations made by this Congress. It is unnecessary to take the time of the committee, it seems to me, to enter upon a question which should be considered on the general law.

But if the gentleman insists on a vote I want to say as I intimated that when you take the taxable property of the District of Columbia and then take the property owned by the Government of the United States, you will find that as far as values are concerned there is no great difference between them. The Government owns about half the taxable property of the District of Columbia, and certainly we do not want to sit here and let that property pay no taxes while the citizens' property in this District must foot all the bills. You certainly do not expect, in other words, the people who own property here shall pay all of the expenses of the District of Columbia, and the Government get all the benefits and pay nothing.

It seems to me that without some statistics, without some data, which the gentleman does not submit to us, he ought not to ask to have this long-established rule changed upon a mere bill of this kind, carrying only $10,000. I appeal to the gentleman to make his fight upon the general law, and not upon this special bill. Members are not prepared to vote upon it now. To many, I have no doubt, this is a new question. They ought not to be asked arbitrarily, without figures, without any kind of calculation, to decide that the Government is paying too much, and the District of Columbia too little, of the revenues. Let us wait until we got to the law that settles this question, and then we can decide it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to reënforce my brother from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] on this proposition. It strikes me that it is just as good an opportunity to pass on a principle when you have one bill up, as when you have another one up, and sometimes a litt'e more so. The people who do not want this principle changed will be making it appear that you have not got time enough to change it then; but we have time enough to-day. Now, it may be difficult to tell how the taxes ought to be levied in the District of Columbia, but there certainly can be some fairer way than just simply to lump it all and say that the people of the United States shall pay one-half, while the people of the District of Columbia pay the other half.

I am opposed to having this Government regarded as a general pap institution for the benefit of some two or three hundred thousand people who happen to live here within the limits of the District of Columbia. If, as a matter of fact, this particular bill ought to be passed, then we ought to pass it, but if the whole principle that underlies it is wrong, why we ought to beat this bill and every one like it that comes up. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," just as much as any other day. As a colleague suggests, "procrastination is the thief of time."

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt a discussion of the fairness or the unfairness, the equity or inequity, of the provisions of the law, passed a long time ago, which provides that half the expenses of carrying on the Government of the District of Columbia should be paid by the General Government and one-half by the people of the District of Columbia. I do not attempt to say whether that was a fair basis of settlement or not. I do say, and whether my colleague, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, has examined the question or not, I know that my colleague, Mr. DE ARMOND, has examined the facts and knows that that is the law, that that basis was fixed by law, not by this Congress, but some twelve or thirteen years ago.

I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that if that principle is wrong, that if that basis is wrong, it should be attacked as a general proposition, and it should be changed along the whole line.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to protest against the statement made by my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND], which is not true in point of fact, and which is not fairly stated by him, although three times repeated, that the committee are recommending the opening of this street to give the right of way to a railroad company. That is not true in point of fact. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] mentioned as an argument, as a fact which would show the utility of the street, that a certain railroad company which had a charter to run its road to the Soldiers' Home on the line of this street, would be enabled thereby to extend its line and furnish means of transportation to the people; but it is grossly inaccurate to say that this is asked for the purpose of giving a right of way to the railroad company. It is asked for by the people of this city, as we understand, because of the accommodation that will come to the general public from the opening of this, one of the principal streets of the city.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman right there allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEARD. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that the purpose is to extend the line of this railroad over this street. That is all right enough, but the argument made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is that the railroad in constructing this line will grade the street and pave it with concrete and make a splendid driveway. Now, I have made some inquiry into this since the gentleman's speech was made, and I find that this company has constructed a road running from Seventh street out along New York avenue to the Soldiers' Home, and they have actually destroyed the street, so that it can not be used for any purpose, for pedestrians, or for vehicles, or for any other purpose except for their street-car line.

Mr. HEARD. The general proposition stated by the gentleman from Tennessee is correct. The law compels the railroad company to grade the street between its tracks, and for 2 feet on either side, with concrete.

Mr. KILGORE. Have not the Commissioners the authority to remit that obligation and allow them to put down cobblestones?

Mr. HEARD. Not that I am aware of. I know of no such law.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will state that this company have made a splendid drive out Seventh street. I am familiar with it, live right by it.

Mr. KILGORE. That is not my information.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is my information, and I live right by it.

Mr. HEARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have the floor I desire to yield to my colleague for a question.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. My information is, and I desire to ask if that be correct, that a law was passed by Congress in 1883 which obligated the Government of the United States to pay one-half of the expenses of the improvement of streets of this kind?

Mr. HEARD. One-half of the general expenses for carrying on of the government of the District of Columbia. One-half of the expenses in the District of Columbia are assumed by the Government on the ground that the Government is assumed to hold one-half of the property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Then I wish to ask my colleague this question: If that statute is in existence does not that create an obligation, in the nature of a vested right, on the part of the Government to meet one-half of these expenses?

Mr. HEARD. That is the existing law, but the ordinary phraseology of appropriations, where they are for the expenditure of money for improvements in the District, is that one-half shall be paid out of the District revenues, the other half to come out of the revenues of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HEARD. A considerable portion of my time having been consumed by interruptions I wish to ask the indulgence of the House for five minutes more. I shall not take up much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes further. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to repeat, I am not here to defend the basis, fixed by a previous Congress long before I came here, upon which the expenses of the District government should be carried. It is not analogous to any other city in the United States, as my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND] would argue by inference; for it is well known that the Government owns a very large proportion of the property here, and as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] very properly says, no fair-minded man would insist that we should tax the people of the District for the improvements of streets and the paving of alleys for the benefit of the Government as well as for the benefit of the residents of the District, and not tax the Government for any part of the expenses. But, Mr. Chairman, let it be understood that the people of this District pay taxes, and the rate of taxes in this District is as great or greater than that which prevails in other cities of this country. I think the regular rate here is $1.50 on the $100, which is exactly that which prevails in the city of my residence, a place of less than 20,000 people.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It is $1.65.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue the general proposition as to the correctness of that basis, but I do insist that if that principle is to be attacked and discussed it should be on broader lines than will be afforded in the discussion of this bill.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the opening of this street is concerned, I regard it as one of the most important improvements in the city. The people who own the property intervening between the cemetery grounds and the Soldiers' Home, a distance, as I am advised, of 1,800 or 2,000 feet, some years ago dedicated to the public the grounds necessary to make the extension, and they had the right to expect that it would be opened through the grounds of the cemetery and the other tract mentioned, so that these people could get the benefit of the extension which they contributed the ground to make and that the general public could have the benefit of the entire street. They have given up the ground they had for the improvement, and in good faith and as a matter of public utility my view is that we should order the street opened. Whether it is opened or not it does not concern me a farthing which statement I am sure it is not necessary for me to make to this House; but I now say that in my judgment it is a work of such utility as will fully justify the expenditure. Beyond that I have nothing further to submit.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as well as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] to this fact. At an early day in the last Congress a bill was introduced the title of which, I think, is as follows:

An act to provide a permanent system of roadways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities.

Meaning, of course, the cities of Washington and Georgetown. That bill was pending during the larger portion of last Congress, and was in charge, I think, of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

Mr. HEARD. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was before the House repeatedly. The bill as originally introduced provided as this does, as I remember, that one-half of the expenses of opening these streets should be borne by the District of Columbia and one-half by the United States. That was the point in controversy; and I must call the attention of my friend on the Committee of the District of Columbia to the fact that no measure has been more carefully considered or more frequently before the House than that measure, and it resulted in this provision. After a long enumeration of the methods of opening streets outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown the following provision is found:

That the amount awarded by said court [trying the question of condemnation] as damages for each highway or reservation, or that part thereof condemned and established under this act, shall be one-half assessed against the lands benefited thereby and the other half shall be a charge upon the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after the careful consideration of that very important measure and its enactment by the last Congress, is it fair or proper for the Committee on the District of Columbia to come in here at this early day, at the very next session, and propose to overturn it?

Mr. HEARD. I will be frank with my friend from Indiana, and state that when this bill was before the committee I had lost sight of the act from which he has just read. I remember now that I presented the report of a conference committee on the bill here, and resisted the contention made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and the report of the committee of conference was rejected. At the close of the session, however, the conference was resumed, and the bill came back and was passed in the shape in which it now stands as a law. That being the case, I can not consistently contest the point now made by the gentleman, and I will not undertake to do so. I had lost sight of that enactment at the time I voted to report this bill from the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection is that the report charging one-half of the expense upon the United States Treasury was twice rejected.

Mr. HEARD. It was rejected once, I am sure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Twice, I think; and finally this proposition was adopted. Now, I know that my friend from Missouri will not desire or consent that that deliberate act of Congress, adopted after careful consideration, shall be disregarded or virtually repealed at the very next session.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that, like the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, I had failed to remember the passage of that law. It was generally overlooked in the committee; and under the circumstances, inasmuch as this proposed improvement is within the District of Columbia and outside the city of Washington, it is probably right that the expense should be charged to the District instead of to the United States.

Mr. HEARD. I had lost sight of the fact that it was outside of the city limits that the improvement was proposed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So had I: but it is outside of the boundary. I will make no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be an amendment inserted in line 13 to harmonize with the one which I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the question be first taken on the pending amendment.

The amendment of Mr. DE ARMOND was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "that," strike out the words "one-half of;" so as to make the provision read: "That the said sum shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 13 of the printed bill, by inserting after the word "moneys," the words "of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon this subject be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 146) "to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home," and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The report of the Commissioners, referred to by Mr. RICHARDSON, is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1893.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia herewith return House bill 146, "to extend North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home," which was referred to them at your instance for their views thereon, and have to make the following recommendation on the subject:

The extension of North Capitol street through the lands of the Prospect Hill Cemetery and of the Barbour tract is contemplated in the plans of street extensions now being drawn under act of March 2, 1893, for a permanent system of highways outside of cities.

The present extension of part width of North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home is desirable, as it will afford a route for convenient and cheap transportation from Washington to the Soldiers' Home. The Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company is authorized by the act of April 30, 1890, to extend a branch of its system from New York avenue via North Capitol street to the Soldiers' Home; the act requires this branch to be built and operated within one year after the opening of North Capitol street; the tracks of the branch are laid from New York avenue to T street, but have not yet been operated. T street is the sixth street north of Florida avenue.

The street-car company has not applied to the Commissioners for the opening of North Capitol street, neither is it known that the company desires to extend its branch up that street, but it is considered by the Commissioners that such extension would be advantageous to the public. The present system of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway is extensive, and permeates the thickly settled part of Washington. The route via North Capitol street is the shortest available one therefrom to the Soldiers' Home.

There is no present necessity for grading to full width the part of North Capitol street proposed to be opened. It is therefore recommended that a provision be inserted in the bill limiting the cost of street grading to $10,000; this will permit the opening of the street to a width of 40 feet, or nearly 40 feet, giving sufficient room for double tracks for street railway.

The amount named is the same as that which the Commissioners propose to recommend for appropriation for 1895 for extending each of the principal avenues and streets whose extensions have been commenced.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman of Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. I am not sufficiently familiar with the provisions of this bill to know whether it requires to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEARD. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, if there is nothing in the bill requiring that it be considered in Committee of the Whole, is it necessary to go into committee?

The SPEAKER. The bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole. If it has been improperly referred the reference can be corrected.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not think there is anything in the bill that would necessarily send it to the Committee of the Whole. It does, however, provide for certain fees.

The motion of Mr. HEARD was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures for the District of Columbia, who shall have the custody and control of such standard weights and measures of the United States as now are or as shall hereafter be provided by the District of Columbia, and which shall be the only standard for weights and measures in said District until Congress shall otherwise provide.

SEC. 2. That the sealer of weights and measures or his assistant shall seal no dry measures unless the same shall conform in all respects to the standard dry measures deposited in the office of the Commissioners. He shall examine all dry measures now used in the District of Columbia, and all dry measures not conforming to the said standard for dry measures shall be by him condemned: and any person or persons obstructing him or his assistant in the discharge of his or their duties under this act shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $20 for every such offense, to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 3. That the sealer of weights and measures shall rectify or brand and seal with the letter W all scalebeams, weights, and measures that may be brought to his office for that purpose, as near the upper edge or ends thereof as possible, for each of which he shall receive from the respective owners thereof 10 cents, and double that sum for rectifying, branding, or sealing at any other place; and if he shall neglect to rectify, brand, or seal any scalebeams, weights, or measures within three days after the same shall have been brought to his office he shall incur a penalty of $5 for every such offense, to be recovered as other fines and penalties are recovered.

SEC. 4. That the sealer of weights and measures shall, under a penalty of $20 for each neglect, at least once in every six months, between the rising and setting of the sun, enter every store, shop, market, or other place where goods are sold within the District of Columbia and examine the scales, weights, and measures, if any therein, and if any scalebeams, weights, or measures shall be found without the official stamp, brand, or seal of the sealer of weights and measures, or deficient or exceeding in weight or measure, the same shall be seized by the sealer of weights and measures, and the person in whose possession such scalebeam, weight, or measure shall be found shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for every such offense, and the sealer of weights and measures shall be entitled to receive for every such examination $1, to be paid by the owner of such scale: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any manufacturer or other person from keeping scalebeams, weights, or measures for sale: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the sealer of weights and measures to enter into any United States establishment in the District of Columbia and examine any scale or measure.

SEC. 5. That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to sell any article by dry measure within the limits of the District of Columbia unless the same shall be measured in dry measures made to conform in all respects to the standard measures of the United States deposited with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and any person or persons within the limits of the District of Columbia selling or offering for sale by dry measure any article by any other form or size of measure shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the District of Columbia, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $10 for every such offense, to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 6. That if any person shall refuse to produce his or her scalebeams, weights, or measures for examination when required by the sealer of weights and measures or his assistant, or refuse to relinquish the same when seized, the person so refusing shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars, to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 7. That any person who shall by any scalebeam, weight, or measure not certified and stamped, branded, or sealed by the sealer of weights and measures or his assistant shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for each and every offense; and if the sealer of weights and measures shall pass any scalebeam, weight, or measure which shall not correspond to the standard herein prescribed he shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more ten dollars, to be recovered as other fines are collected.

SEC. 8. That if any person shall sell by the steelyard and the sealer of weights and measures (who is hereby authorized to examine any steelyard which he may see in use) shall, on examination, find the same not to agree with the standard aforesaid, he shall seize the same, and the person found selling therewith, or the owner thereof, shall incur a penalty of not less than five nor more than ten dollars, and the said sealer of weights and measures shall twice every year examine and adjust every public hay scale in the District of Columbia, and he shall be entitled to receive from said District for such examination the sum of $2.

SEC. 9. That the sealer of weights and measures shall keep a book wherein he shall enter the names of persons who shall have scalebeams, weights, and measures adjusted, the number and description of the same, and the times when adjusted, and he shall report annually to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the operations of his office.

SEC. 10. That all weights and measures which shall have been seized by the sealer of weights and measures and adjusted, shall, whenever practicable, be delivered to their respective owners upon their paying the legal fees of the sealer of weights and measures for sealing, stamping, and branding the same.

SEC. 11. That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to use, for weighing any article for sale in the several markets or elsewhere in the District of Columbia, any spring-balance scale, unless the same shall have been examined and certified to by the sealer of weights and measures, or his assistant, to be accurate, which certificate shall be attached to said scale on a conspicuous part thereof, with the seal of the sealer of weights and measures stating the fact of its accuracy, and the date of the examination and certificate, and no such certificate shall be valid for a longer period than three calendar months, and for each examination and certificate the sealer of weights and measures, or his assistant, shall be entitled to charge and receive from the owner of such scale the sum of 25 cents, and every person offending against the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars, one-half to go to the use of the informer, to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 12. That the sealer of weights and measures, or his assistant, is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to examine all measures, weights, and scales of all hucksters or other persons retailing produce within the limits of the District of Columbia at least once in every three months, and to seal the measures, weights, and scales of such hucksters and retailers of produce, for which he shall be entitled to receive a fee of 25 cents for each scale, weight, or measure so sealed, and any huckster or other person offering produce for sale who shall have in his possession any measure, weight, or scale not having been sealed within three months by the sealer of weights and measures, or if such measure, weight, or scale shall have been altered with intent to defraud, such huckster or other person shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for every such offense, one-half to go the use of the informer, to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 13. That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to use for weighing any article for sale any counter scale, unless the same shall have been examined and certified by the sealer of weights and measures to be accurate, which certificate shall be attached to such scale, in a conspicuous part thereof, with the seal of the sealer of weights and measures thereon, stating the fact of its accuracy and the date of the examination and certificate, and no such certificate shall be valid for a longer period than six calendar months, and for each examination and certificate the sealer of weights and measures shall be entitled to receive 25 cents, and any person offending against the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for every such offense, one-half to go to the use of the informer, to be collected and applied as other fines and penalties are collected and applied.

SEC. 14. That the sealer of weights and measures, or his assistant, is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to inspect and test the weight of all butter offered for sale within the limits of the District of Columbia, and all butter offered for sale in prints, professing to be a pound or half pound in weight, and falling short half an ounce or more in the pound, shall be seized by him and sold, one-half of the proceeds of such sale to go to the informer and the other half to be applied as other fines and penalties are applied.

SEC. 15. That the sealer of weights and measures, or his assistant, shall annually examine every yardstick or measure for use in the measuring of any dry goods offered for sale in the District of Columbia, and if found correct shall seal the same with the year of the inspection, and he shall be entitled to receive for each inspection and seal the sum of 10 cents from the owner thereof, and it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to use any yardstick or measure in the sale of dry goods that has not been sealed within a year, and any person offending against the provisions of this section, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for each and every such offense, one-half of such fine to go to the use of the informer, and to be collected and applied as other fines are collected and applied.

SEC. 16. That all laws and ordinances inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall affect the law now applicable to the large railroad scales, but the same shall remain unrepealed and unaffected by this act."

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in reference to this bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, September 10, 1892.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners transmit herewith draft of a bill "for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and recommend early and favorable action thereon. This bill has been prepared after a conference with the sealer of weights and measures and the attorney for the District.

The inclosed copy of a communication from the sealer of weights and measures presents a few of the more important reasons for the proposed legislation.

Very respectfully,

MYRON M. PARKER,
Acting President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEARD. It will be observed from the communication just read that this bill was furnished to us by the Commissioners, it having been prepared, as they state, in consultation with the present sealer of weights and measures and the District attorney. It not only has the approval of the Commissioners, but was prepared under their direction and according to their views of the exigency of the case. I will now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], who is familiar with the points involved in the bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. This bill, Mr. Chairman, does not provide for the creation of any new office. There now exists in the District of Columbia the office of sealer of weights and measures. The only purpose of the bill is to reform the existing law in certain particulars, and to provide against certain abuses which have grown up in this District in consequence of the disposition on the part of hucksters to evade the laws, and to sell by short weights or measures. The bill gives to the sealer of weights and measures additional power with reference to the arrest of parties guilty of these fraudulent practices, so that they may be brought to the same tests as regular dealers in this District. The provisions of the bill are in the interest of purchasers of produce in the District, and are designed to prevent imposition or swindling by dealers. That is all there is in the bill. It is simply a reënactment of the old law with these additional provisions.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to ask whether there is any such officer now in the District as this sealer of weights and measures.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Of course there is; and there has been all along.

Mr. KILGORE. What, then, is the purpose of this bill; to extend the duties or authority of that officer?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. If the gentleman from Texas had given attention to my remarks he would not have had occasion to ask these questions.

Mr. KILGORE. I could not hear a word the gentleman was saying.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I stated in the first place that this bill creates no new office. In the second place, I said that it does increase in certain particulars the power or authority of the present sealer of weights and measures. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, if he is undertaking to protect his constituents in this regard, that the bill makes no appropriation from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the Government we know is "dead broke," and therefore I think we ought to be a little particular in that matter.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, according to the gentleman's idea the traders in the District of Columbia are becoming very wealthy. Now, by this bill they are required to pay the sealer of weights and measures certain fees for seeing that they act honestly in their trading.

Mr. KILGORE. Could they not be honest without having this officer to look after them?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. They ought to be, and perhaps if the gentleman from Texas would supervise them a little they would be; but as the matter now stands it seems that they are not, or at least some of them are not.

Mr. KILGORE. Does not the bill provide for an assistant that has not heretofore been provided for?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I think there is an assistant now.

Mr. HEARD. I believe there is.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But whether that is so or not, the bill has reference simply to the sealer of weights and measures.

Mr. KILGORE. It might make this difference, that if there is an assistant the principal simply sits back while the assistant does the work.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. At any rate, the expense is paid by the District; the constituents of the gentleman from Texas do not pay it.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the people of this District ought not to be improperly taxed.

Mr. HEARD. I feel very sure there is already an assistant under the law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The whole gist of the matter is that my distinguished friend from Texas thinks that every bill coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia is liable to attack and ought to be defeated.

Mr. KILGORE. That seems to be a good theory to work upon.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The gentleman can afford to attack the people of this District because his constituents are not directly interested. That is about the whole of the matter.

Mr. KILGORE. One other question. This bill defines a great many offenses and imposes a great many penalties. Are not these new features of legislation?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. To some extent they are.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Alabama will allow me to say that the penalties are only such as the District attorney and the sealer of weights and measures have recommended to the Commissioners as necessary for the purpose of making this legislation effective.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Under the provisions of this bill no honest man will be affected. The criminal laws never reach an honest citizen.

Mr. KILGORE. That is a mistake. It very often happens that an honest, innocent man is prosecuted unjustly. No lawyer should make such a statement as the gentleman has just made.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I have never known an honest man to be prosecuted unless his associations were not exactly what they should have been.

Mr. FUNK. I should like to ask, for information, what fee is to be paid for examining these various weights and measures?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Different fees.

Mr. FUNK. Yardsticks, for instance?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Ten cents.

Mr. FUNK. For each yardstick?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. FUNK. Does this officer get one-half of that fee?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir; I think he does.

Mr. FUNK. Well, is not that an enormous fee? Is it not in many instances more than the service is worth?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I do not know about that. The work of this officer is the same without regard to the value of the yardstick. The object of the bill is to prevent the dealer from using a yardstick which does not conform to the law.

Mr. FUNK. The object is all right. I have no objection to that if the price is not exorbitant. Why, how many can this man examine in a single ten minutes' I would ask? Perhaps a hundred, and so he gets $10 for about ten minutes' work. It seems to me that it is quite an exorbitant price. I am not objecting to a fee, if it is a proper fee. There ought to be, of course, some fee in connection with it. But the idea of 10 cents for each and every yardstick. Why, perhaps some merchants have thousands of them.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not in use, of course.

Mr. COX. How many yardsticks has he got to examine?

Mr. FUNK. All, I understand.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Oh, no; only those used in his trade.

Mr. FUNK. Then I missunderstood the proposition, and beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not affect those that he sells.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why should it not?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is only those used in selling his own goods to other people.

Mr. FUNK. Well, even in that case he may have a number of them, twenty or thirty.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama why they should not be required to have inspected and stamped the yardsticks they are going to sell for somebody else to use?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. They may never be used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, they are using them for sale, at all events. Why not have them stamped?

Mr. FUNK. That is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why should they not be stamped or branded?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The object is to prevent the use of a yardstick without being stamped in transactions made by a merchant here. Of course, if these yardsticks are sold, and somebody else undertakes to use them here they have to be stamped.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is a legitimate and profitable business to be carried out according to the provisions of this bill, then it ought to extend to all.

Mr. HEARD. It will extend to all that are used. The conditions are the same in all cases.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the cost of making that examination and stamping the measure?

Mr. HEARD. I am not able to answer the gentleman in that respect.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will say to my friend that so far as the compensation for the service is concerned I have paid but little attention to it, because the matter has been passed in review before the Commissioners. They examined it all, and have consented to the fees. Presumably they know something of the amount that ought to be allowed for this purpose.

Now, I move——

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if in order I would like to offer an amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Alabama to have yielded the floor.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I did not. I was about to make a motion, but will yield to the gentleman if he wishes to make a suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. It is for the purpose of improving the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that general debate has not yet been closed, and until that is done amendments would not be in order.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment in line 2 of section 3, on page 2 of the bill. I desire to offer an amendment there and will state why, with the consent of the Chair.

Section 3 provides that the sealer of weights and measures shall rectify or brand and seal with the letter "W" all scalebeams, weights, and measures that may be brought to his office for that purpose as near the upper edge or ends thereof as possible," etc.

Now, I suppose the object in the sealer's examining the scalebeams, weights, and measures is for the purpose of benefiting or protecting those who may purchase or buy from persons using such weights or measures and having products to sell by them, and that every precaution ought to be taken to protect the public, and, therefore, that the intent of the law should be carried out.

It seems to me that if the sealer simply stamp, or print, a small letter "W" on a weight or measure that it would be of very little importance or benefit to me when I went to buy a yard of calico, a bushel of potatoes, or a pound of sugar. I could not tell whether that scale, or that yardstick, or that measure had been examined and approved by the sealer or not. It would probably take me a longer time to find the little letter "W" on the measure than it would take me to earn a peck of potatoes, and it seems to me, therefore, if Congress is going to try to protect purchasers—and I am not running protection into politics—that we ought to have the sealer put such a brand on the measure as that when a person goes to buy anything measured by it he will be able to determine that the weight, measure, or yardstick, has been properly examined and sealed. It ought to be marked in a conspicuous way, and hence for the purpose of making more distinct what we are trying to reach I offer an amendment, to which I think there can be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 2 of section 3 the words, "with the letter 'W,'" and insert, "approved by the District sealer."

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] that this plan of sealing or branding with the letter "W" has been in use for several years, and that this would make trouble.

I do not see that we are to consider the little trouble that might be caused by furnishing to every purchaser from a dealer in any kind of goods, wares, or merchandise, an opportunity of knowing that he is having his purchases weighed or measured by scales or measures that have been approved by the District Commissioners or by the sealer of the District. It would certainly cost but very little to make such a stamp; and I thought of inserting the sealer's name, but as I suppose the sealer changes every once in awhile, there would have to be a new stamp made every time the sealer changed if his name was put on, hence I thought the insertion of the words, "approved by the District sealer," would answer for all time and under all sealers. That would cost but a very small sum.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It would not happen once in a hundred times that any purchaser would want to examine these weights or measures; but this stamp is put there to enable the purchaser, if he sees proper, to ascertain that these measures are correct. In ordinary trafficking we would not examine them.

Another and more important purpose is to enable the sealer of weights and measures, from time to time, to tell whether these men are conforming to the law. We must depend upon the faithfulness of the sealer of weights and measures to keep these traders correct in their dealings.

Now, if a man desires to ascertain whether or not the dealer is conforming to the law, all he has to do is to ascertain what the law is, and what particular sign the law provides to be put upon these measures. In this case it is the letter "W." He looks for it and easily ascertains whether it is there. It is just as effective as anything else you could put upon the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. As I understand from this bill there is nothing but the letter "W" placed upon the measure?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But if we know the law, we know what that means.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Why can not the man who is selling the goods put the letter "W" on his own measure?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. He would incur a penalty if he did so.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Is there any law to prohibit him from putting it on?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Is there anything that would prevent him from putting on the words proposed by the gentleman in his amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Probably not; but then he would not go to that trouble.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is only then a question of convenience to the dealer, whether he puts on the one or the other.

There is no force whatever in the argument, because whether you use the letter or the word, the effect is the same, and the opportunity is the same to the purchaser to ascertain whether the law is being complied with by the seller.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. If it is of no interest to the purchaser, there is no use in taking all this trouble.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] that in Committee of the Whole a motion to lay on the table is not in order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again reported.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division, demanded by Mr. SMITH of Illinois, there were—ayes 20, noes 29.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to this bill reported by the committee.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, I overlooked that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall affect the law now applicable to the large railroad scales, but the same shall remain unrepealed and unaffected by this act.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say to the House that that language was omitted. Under the existing law the the sealer of weights and measures was obliged to inspect the railroad scales as well as other scales. In the draft prepared of this bill those scales were omitted inadvertently, and this is to perfect the bill, making it retain supervision of these scales as now provided for by existing law.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLANCHARD, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment and with recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SERVICE CONNECTIONS WITH WATER MAINS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized, whenever the roadway of a street is about to be paved or macadamized, to make service connections in such street for all abutting lots and premises with the water mains and sewer provided for the service of said lots and premises. The entire cost of the said connections shall be paid from the current appropriations, respectively, for the extension of the sewer and water-supply systems and shall be assessed against the abutting property and collected in like manner as assessments which are levied under the compulsory permit system; the sums so collected shall be credited to the respective appropriations for the extension of the sewer and water-supply systems,

Mr. HEARD. I desire to have a letter of the Commissioners read.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, September 26, 1893.

SIR: Referring to H. R. bill 2360, "to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia," which was referred to the Commissioners at your instance for their report thereon, the Commissioners have to recommend that the inclosed amended bill be substituted therefor, as the original bill does not fully nor properly provide for the desired result.

The object sought to be obtained is a worthy and necessary one. The present law provides that the Commissioners shall require connections to be made with sewers and water mains before the pavements are laid, but makes no provision for the enforcement of this requirement, thus allowing the Commissioners to do no more than notify property owners of contemplated improvements, and request them to make prior connections with sewers and water mains.

This request, however, is very frequently disregarded and new pavements are often torn up and patched as the result of subsequent sewer and water connections. The enactment of the proposed bill will obviate this difficulty and thus prove beneficial not only to the District in the preservation of new improvements, but to the property owners in preventing the expense of cutting and repairing the pavement. It will also be the means of checking the damage and danger consequent upon the leaking of poorly laid service pipes, which now frequently necessitates the tearing up of large portions of the pavement in order to properly remedy the trouble. If the connections were put in by the District, as the amended bill provides for, the work would be done with the same care and skill with which water mains are laid, and leaks in service pipes would be as rare as they are in the mains.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, the reasons for the passage of the bill are so clearly stated by the Commissioners in their communication that I deem it unnecessary to offer anything further in explanation, unless some gentleman desires to ask me some questions.

The object may be stated in a very condensed form, and it is simply that when a street is to be paved the owners of the abutting property shall be notified and compelled to put in the connection before the pavement is laid down. The change sought to be effected in the law is this. The present law does not enable the Commissioners to have that done. The Commissioners show in this communication that if they notify the owners to make the connection they sometimes do not comply. The Commissioners then go on and pave the street, after which the owners cut up the street in making the connection.

This bill authorizes the Commissioners to expend the money necessary to put in the connection where the owners make default and assess the money against the property. That is the nature of the bill; and in consonance with the suggestion made by the Commissioners there is a substitute offered for the original bill, the bill sent to us by the Commissioners, which I now ask have to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that the Clerk has read and the committee has been considering the substitute reported by that committee in lieu of the original bill, and the original bill is not before the committee.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the Monument Grounds and reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

MRS. MARY O. AUGUSTA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLANCHARD in the Chair.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 4013) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States of America hereby quitclaims and releases to Mary O. Augusta, devisee of Alexander T. Augusta, deceased, her heirs or assigns, any title or interest which the United States may have by reason of any escheat, or supposed escheat, in and to the following-described real estate, situate and being in the city of Washington, D. C., known and designated on the public plat of said city as the west half of lot numbered 3, in square numbered 247, as subdivided into lots 54 and 55.

Mr. HEARD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the report in this bill sets forth the facts clearly and I think in sufficient detail, and I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. COOPER of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4013) "to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia," recommend that the same do pass.

Said bill was referred to the District Commissioners, who favorably reported it, and accompany their report with the following opinion of the attorney of the District:

"WASHINGTON, October 30, 1893.

"GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to return to you herewith House bill No. 4013 (Fifty-third Congress, first session), to release to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia, which was referred to this office for advice as to the propriety of recommending the passage of the bill.

"It appears that in 1866 one Caroline Hill died in this District, intestate and unmarried, possessed of the west half of lot 3 (since divided into lots 54 and 55) in square 247. In the same year a bill was filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia by Louisa Warren against Jane R. Brent and Eliza Miller, who were alleged to be Caroline Hill's heirs at law, to subject said property to the payment of an alleged indebtedness of Caroline Hill. The case was referred to the then auditor of the court, Hon. Walter S. Cox, now one of the justices thereof, for a preliminary report on the matters of the bill. The auditor took some depositions and reported to the court that it appeared that Caroline Hill left no children, and that her nearest relatives were Jane R. Brent and Eliza Williams, grandchildren of her paternal grandfather, who were defendants to the bill. That Caroline Hill's father was a white man and that her mother was a black woman, and that, inasmuch as intermarriage between the two races was forbidden by the laws of Maryland, the presumption was that the parents of the deceased were not married, and that she was an illegitimate child, and hence never inherited the property from her father, and that the same had consequently escheated to the United States. Notwithstanding this report, the court appears to have ordered a sale of the property and appointed a trustee to make the same.

"In 1868 the trustee reported a sale to Alexander T. Augusta. The purchaser declined to take the property on the ground of defective title, and a rule to show cause why he should not complete his purchase was issued. He answered, setting up information communicated to him by his counsel, Mr. Ward, then a leading examiner of titles in this District, to the effect that the title was defective. Notwithstanding his answer and the report of the auditor, the court ordered Augusta to comply with the terms of sale. He then complied, and the trustee, Mr. Saunders, conveyed the property to him by deed dated June 24, 1868, which was duly recorded in the proper office in this District.

"I am satisfied that the title of Mrs. Augusta, who takes the property under the will of her husband, is defective; that Caroline Hill never inherited the property from her father, and had no interest in it, and that the court was without jurisdiction to decree a sale of it for the payment of her debts.

"On the facts and circumstances of this case I think it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable for the United States to claim this property, which Mrs. Augusta's husband was compelled to take by force of the decree of a court of the United States, for which he paid his money in good faith, supposing he was getting a good title. The interest of the United States should be released to Mrs. Augusta. The bill is a proper one, and one which should be favorably recommended to Congress.

"Very respectfully,

"S. T. THOMAS,
"Attorney District Columbia.

"The COMMISSIONERS, ETC."

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the report which has just been read by the Clerk states the facts quite fully. This bill has had the careful consideration of the District Commissioners and the District attorney, and the Committee on the District of Columbia have unanimously reported in its favor. If there is no objection and if no one desires further information concerning it, I move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask whether it is the purpose of the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up other bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I understand that there are others to be called up.

The motion of Mr. COOPER of Indiana was agreed to.

ALLEY IN SQUARE 493, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 213) to pay for alley condemned in square No. 493, Washington, D. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved March 1, 1889, entitled "An act to reappropriate to pay for alley condemned in square numbered 493," be amended by striking out all the words after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert:

"That, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, there be, and the same hereby is, appropriated a sum sufficient to pay, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from August 6, in the year 1870, to the date of the approval of this act, the persons entitled to the amount awarded by the jury of condemnation for the land taken for an alley so far as the same relates to lots numbered 2, 3, 12, 13, and 15, in square numbered 493, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report (by Mr. HEARD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 213) entitled "A bill to pay for alley condemned in square No. 493, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia," has considered the same and makes the following statement of facts:

The alley referred to is one of those condemned between the years 1865 and 1875. As shown by the report of the Committee of the District of Columbia in the Fifty-first Congress, there was appropriated in 1881 by Congress a certain sum for amounts due property owners for ground condemned and used for alleys of the city. The amount due to owners of square No. 493 was never called for, and was covered into the Treasury as a surplus.

The Commissioners of the District, to whom a copy of the bill was sent for their approval, said:

"The land has been condemned and taken for public purposes, and should be paid for."

The act referred to reads, as follows:

"An act to reappropriate to pay for alley condemned in square numbered 493.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That of the surplus that has been covered into the Treasury of the sum appropriated by the act approved June 30, 1880, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1881,' for amount due property owners for ground condemned and used for alleys, there be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated so much as will be sufficient to pay, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from August 6, 1870, to the date of the approval of this act, the persons entitled to the amount awarded by the jury of condemnation for the land taken for an alley through square numbered 493, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

"Approved March 1, 1889."

This act became inoperative because the appropriation out of which the money was to be paid had already been disposed of, half of it to the surplus fund and the other half to the District of Columbia, as reported by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, whose letter is hereto attached.

This letter of the First Comptroller is as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., January 24, 1889.

"SIR: Your letter of this date has been received, and in reply thereto you are respectfully informed that the act of March 1, 1889, entitled 'An act to reappropriate to pay for alley condemned in square numbered 493' (Stats. at L., vol. 25, p. 751), can not be carried into effect, because before the passage of that act the 'surplus' mentioned therein had been disposed of as follows: One-half thereof had been carried to the surplus fund of the United States as provided by section 3690, Revised Statues, and the other half had been reappropriated by act of June 30, 1884, and carried to the credit of the District of Columbia, on account of the sewer debt of the District of Columbia to the United States.

"Very respectfully,

"A. C. MATTHEWS,
"Comptroller.

"By J. R. GARRISON,
"Deputy Comptroller.

"DANIEL O. C. CALLAGHAN,
"Washington, D. C."

Upon a reference of the bill to the Commissioners by this, your committee, the board in its reply says:

"The Commissioners have recommended to several former Congresses that the relief contemplated by this bill be granted."

In the light of the foregoing facts, the committee therefore recommends that the bill do pass.

Mr. HEARD. Reports have been made upon this measure at three or four different times, but I think the one that was made in 1890 by the Commissioners when the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] was chairman of the District Committee, contains the information by which the House will probably be guided, and I therefore ask that it be read, and also the one made in September last.

The reports were read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 1, 1890.

SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to make the following report relative to H. R. bill 4768, "to pay for alley condemned in square 493, Washington, D. C.," referred to them at your instance.

A law, having in view the payment contemplated in the bill under consideration, was approved March 1, 1889, but failed to afford the relief intended, because the unexpended balance of the appropriation out of which the payment had been directed to be made had been used in 1887, with other then existing balances of appropriations, to reimburse the United States the amount advanced under the act of June 30, '84, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia."—United States Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 63.

Respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS, President.

Hon. WILLIAM W. GROUT,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, September 21, 1893.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners recommend favorable action upon H. R. bill 213, "to pay for alley condemned in square 493, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia," which was referred to them on the 6th instant, at your instance, for their views. The Commissioners have recommended to several former Congresses that the relief contemplated by this bill be granted, and their reasons will no doubt be found on the files of your committee. If their previous letters have been mislaid or destroyed they will furnish others if so requested.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HEARD. The Government condemned certain property for use as alleys and appropriated the money to pay for it, but when it was called for it had been expended for other District purposes. The Commissioners have made recommendations no less than three or four times in favor of the reappropriation of the money.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to ask the gentleman how long this money remained subject to the call of the property owners.

Mr. HEARD. I am not prepared to state, but I think that information substantially is contained in the report which has been read. The money was appropriated, and the call was made for it, but when the call was made the money had been expended for other purposes and was not available.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Was the money which was called for by the other owners of land in the alley paid with interest?

Mr. HEARD. It was. The land was bought by the Government, and the original appropriation carried a sufficient amount to pay for it with interest. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this is the last bill pertaining to the District of Columbia that is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HEARD. It is the last. I therefore move that the committee rise and report this bill and the preceding one to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 4013) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD also, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 213) to pay for alley condemned in square No. 493, Washington, D. C., and had directed him to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLEYS IN SQUARE 751.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3629) to close alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the alleys in square numbered 751, in the city of Washington, D. C., be closed and the land contained therein revert to the owners of the abutting property.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That any conveyance of title in this act contained shall be operative only so long as the land is used for charitable purposes.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is to vacate certain alleys in a block of ground which is now owned almost entirely by the charitable institution known as "The Little Sisters of the Poor." This institution owns the ground on both sides of these alleys, and in fact all the block except one corner. The report of the Commissioners, which I will ask to have read in a moment, states that although the Commissioners gave notice by advertisement in the city papers to all parties concerned to appear, if any desired to appear in opposition to this proposition, nobody appeared to oppose, but several persons appeared to support the measure.

Along with these papers is a letter from the person owning that corner of the block which is not owned by this charitable institution; and said party assents to this proposed vacation. The only owner of property touching these alleys and having an easement over them is the institution I have named. The amendment reported by the committee provides that this act shall be operative only so long as the land is used for charitable purposes.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] has the papers in the case, and I yield to him for further explanation of the measure.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, after the explanation which has been given by the chairman of the commit ee [Mr. HEARD] there is very little further to be said on this bill. Its object is to vacate certain alleys in square No. 751. The property abutting on these alleys belongs to a charitable institution known as the Little Sisters of the Poor. They have spent a large amount of money in improving this block; they now desire to improve it still further, and there being no other interests involved than theirs, they ask Congress to vacate these alleys so that they may use the ground or a portion of it for building purposes. A lot on one corner of the block is owned by an individual (the only property owner in the entire block, except this institution) who has given his assent to this proposition. As has been stated, an amendment reported by the committee provides—

That any conveyance of title in this act contained shall be operative only so long as the land is used for charitable purposes.

The measure has received the full sanction of the committee; and I think there can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the length of this alley? Does it extend through the whole block?

Mr. BABCOCK. This alley is in three sections, and is irregular in its course. I have here a map showing the situation of the land, with all the measurements. This map is open to the inspection of any gentleman who desires to examine it. I can hardly explain the matter except to a gentleman who will make such personal examination.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand from the gentleman's explanation that this alley is not a passageway from one street to another.

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. So that no public convenience would be affected by the vacation of the alley?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all. The public has really no interest in the matter.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee, it was agreed to.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEARD. I move that the committee now rise and report its action to the House; but before that motion is put I desire to make a statement. My attention has been called to the fact that a bill which we shall ask unanimous consent to consider will have to be considered in Committee of the Whole. It is a bill not on the Calendar. I desire at the conclusion of this statement to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time.

Last Friday the Committee on the District of Columbia received from the Commissioners of the District a bill which they requested us to introduce and have passed at the earliest practicable moment. The object of the bill is to constitute two members of the board of Commissioners, when sitting as an excise board, a quorum to do business. It seems an unusual state of case that a majority of the board does not now constitute a quorum: but that seems to be the judgment of their attorney, and the Commissioners desire an authoritative declaration of law to the effect that two members of the board of Commissioners sitting as an excise board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The point to which I desire to direct attention is this: As is well understood, a bill which has not been regularly referred to the committee and reported back can not be considered exc pt by unanimous consent.

That bill was referred to the committee and a favorable report was authorized to be made, but it was not made in time to go upon the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent of the House that it may be considered now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the pending motion is that the committee rise and report favorably the bill H. R. 3629. The Chair does not think that in Committee of the Whole unanimous consent, such as he has asked for, can be granted.

Mr. HEARD. Then I move that the committee rise and report the bill just considered favorably to the House.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if that bill would authorize two of the District Commissioners, sitting as an excise board, to grant licenses for the sale of liquor?

Mr. HEARD. That bill is not now before the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I am asking as to this bill.

Mr. HEARD. The bill considered in committee relates to a different subject.

Mr. PICKLER. But is there not a bill before the committee to allow two members of the Board to exercise that authority?

Mr. HEARD. I have withdrawn that bill temporarily.

The motion of Mr. HEARD was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3629), had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, and as so amended that the bill do pass.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXCISE BOARD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to ask unanimous consent of the House for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4569) to amend an act regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to call it up.

Mr. HEARD. I was not certain about that, for the reason that the bill, although reported, is not upon the printed Calendar. It has been reported by the committee, but the report has not yet been printed.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration in order that there may be no question about the right to consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be, and there is hereby, constituted an excise board of the District of Columbia, which shall consist of the three Commissioners of the District, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum for business, and the duty of which shall be to take up and consider all applications for license to sell intoxicating liquors, and to take action on such applications, and the action of said board shall be final and conclusive, and only on the granting by the said board of a license to an applicant to sell intoxicating liquors shall the assessor issue a license to such applicant; and the said board shall make such rules and regulations for carrying into effect this act as they may deem requisite and proper. And said board shall make an annual report to Congress, setting forth the number of applications for license, both favorably and unfavorably acted on, the number of persons convicted for violations of this statute, and the number of fines collected and uncollected.

Mr. PICKLER. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Its consideration does not require unanimous consent. The gentleman has a right to call it up.

Mr. PICKLER. But the gentleman asked unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Rule XXVI, clause 2, provides as follows:

The second and fourth Mondays in each month shall, when claimed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I understood this bill was not on the Calendar. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to consider it.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported this morning on the call of committees for reports. It was referred to the Calendar. It is not yet on the printed Calendar, having been only reported this morning.

Mr. PICKLER. But could it be considered until it is placed on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It could when called up by the committee having it in charge. The gentleman probably confuses this with the proceedings under the hour rule. That rule provides that the committee may call up a bill reported on a previous day. But this is a different case. The Committee on the District of Columbia has the right to consider any business presented by the committee. The committee favorably reports this bill and calls it up for consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand the Speaker to hold that the committee would have the right to call up for consideration a bill not reported by it?

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported by the committee.

Mr. KILGORE. But not yet printed and placed on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. No; it was reported this morning.

Mr. PICKLER. Why does the chairman of the committee ask unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HEARD. I will state the reason, Mr. Speaker. I stated before that this bill was not yet on the Calendar, that is to say, not on the printed Calendar. While it has been reported by the committee it was not to be found on the Calendar; and I called attention to the fact so that if there was any possible doubt of the right of the committee to call it up that would be satisfied by the consent of the House. I did not myself believe that it was necessary to ask unanimous consent, but I did not wish to ask for the consideration of a bill under the circumstances where there may have been some doubt.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Can not it wait until another day?

Mr. HEARD. I wanted a declaration as to whether or not the bill should be considered. Now, I hope the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] will be content to let the bill be called up. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4569).

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PICKLER) there were—ayes 15, noes 29.

Mr. HEARD. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused, 30 members, not a sufficient number, voting therefor.

Mr. PICKLER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The noes have it, and the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

SALE OF LIQUORS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3740) to amend an act entitled "An act regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia."

The bill was read at length.

Mr. DINGLEY. Should not this bill be considered in Committee of the Whole? It is an amendment to the same act which we have just refused to consider in Committee of the Whole. It is a bill relating to revenue.

The SPEAKER. The other bill created a board. This does not. It merely provides a regulation as to the issue of licenses.

Mr. DINGLEY. But this makes certain regulations with reference to the issuing of these same licenses, affecting the revenue. If we should have gone into committee on the other bill, we certainly should on this.

The SPEAKER. The rule refers to bills raising revenue. This bill is merely to put a limitation upon the issuing of licenses by providing that no retailer shall be located within a certain distance of any school, etc.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it has the effect to increase the number. It practically gives certain men licenses who are not authorized to have licenses under the existing law.

The SPEAKER. This would be a limitation.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the provision of this is to increase the number when read in connection with the original law.

Mr. PICKLER. An increase or decrease in the revenue of the District will depend on the passage or failure of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The law passed on the 3d of March last provided that no license should be granted for the carrying on of the liquor traffic within 400 feet of a schoolhouse or church. Now the proposition is to put in an exception, that all those who had licenses on the 3d of March last shall now be entitled to receive licenses, thus increasing the number entitled to receive them over the number who would be entitled to receive them under the existing law.

The SPEAKER. Still it is a regulation.

Mr. HEARD. There is no proof that it will make any difference in the amount of revenue to be received.

Mr. DINGLEY. It appears on the face of the bill that it does increase the number.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It makes a difference in the revenues of the District.

Mr. HEARD. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me any amendment to this law, which is a law relating to the revenues of the District, ought to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, just the same as the tariff bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This is a revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct it to be referred to the Committee of the Whole, out of abundant caution. It is rather a difficult question to determine. The rule refers all bills or resolutions involving a tax or a charge on the people to the Committee of the Whole. This is an amendment to the tax act, as the Chair understands it, and the act itself would have to be considered in Committee of the Whole because it is a tax act. Therefore the Chair will refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to go into the Committee of the Whole, if he wishes to.

Mr. HEARD. In view of the fact that the House has just refused to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill, simply because that bill had the word "excise" printed in the title, I apprehend that the House is hardly ready to go into Committee of the Whole to take up this bill. Therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the vote,

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. MOSES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEARD (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 12, 1893, at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CULLOM. There is perhaps a resolution upon the table that comes over from yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Illinois that there are two resolutions upon the table that come over from yesterday.

Mr. CULLOM. If it is not important that they be acted upon at this time, as I have an engagement to meet the joint commission in reference to the reorganization of the Departments, I should like to occupy the attention of the Senate for a while.

Mr. PEFFER. I have no objection to passing the resolutions over, provided they will retain their present position and come up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If passed over by consent the resolutions will hold their position on the table, to be presented either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair repeat his announcement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the resolutions are passed over at this time by consent, they will be laid before the Senate either to-day or to-morrow morning, holding their place on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 4,000 copies of the document entitled "Imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States during the years 1890 to 1893; with the rates and amount of duty collected;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 42) permitting Anson Mills, colonel of Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, yesterday I gave notice that if agreeable to the Senate I would ask leave to occupy the time of the Senate for a little while to-day, mainly with reference to the question of the repeal of the election laws, so called. I supposed when I determined to ask the attention of the Senate to-day that the Senate bill which was then upon the Calendar or laid on the table I believe, and which is now I think by consent on the table, would remain subject to general discussion without reference, as I understood that to be the desire of a portion at least of the Senate. Since that time the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who has charge of the bill now before the Senate, consented that the House bill should be referred.

As the bill now before the Senate is, as stated, substantially the same as the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, and the Senate bill having been before the Judiciary Committee, it is probable, at least, that the same bill or one very much like it will come back from the Committee on Privileges and Elections after it has been considered there. So I feel justified in asking the attention of the Senate upon the question at this time.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Illinois for information what is the matter before the Senate on which he is speaking?

Mr. CULLOM. The bill proposing to repeal the election laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Illinois that the title of the bill now on the table be read.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 412) to repeal Title XXVI of the Revised Statutes, known as the Federal election law.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the subject of the protection of the elective franchise from fraud, having been one which has engaged the attention of the body politic for many years, and having been a matter upon which the power of all branches of the Government has at various times been invoked and exercised in behalf of right, justice, and public decency, it will be well to give a brief consideration to the history and record of such exercise.

Preliminary to this it will be instructive to consider briefly the discussion in the convention of 1787, indulged in by the framers of the Constitution, and to quote the clause of that great instrument which empowers the Congress to enact laws of the kind in question. It reads as follows, viz:

Article I, section 4: "The time, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

In the Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1281, the position taken by Mr. Madison, Mr. King, and Mr. Gouverneur Morris, respectively, upon the then pending question is given as follows:

Mr. MADISON. The necessity of a general government supposes that the State Legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local conveniences or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people and not to the Legislatures of the States supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the Legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. These were words of great latitude. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power. Whether the electors should vote by ballot or viva voce; should assemble at this place or that place; should be divided into districts or all meet at one place; should all vote for all the Representatives or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district—these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments.

Whenever the State Legislatures had a favorite measure to carry they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed. Besides, the inequality of the representation in the Legislatures of particular States would produce a like inequality in their representation in the National Legislature, as it was presumable that the counties having the power in the former case would secure it to themselves in the latter. What danger could there be in giving a controlling power to the National Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a senate to be chosen by the State Legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted, their representatives could not be dangerous.

Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State Legislatures. Surely, then, if confidence is due to the latter it must be due to the former. It seemed as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State Legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the General Legislature as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their representatives in the State Legislature.

Mr. KING. If this power be not given to the National Legislature, their right of judging of the returns of their members may be frustrated. No probability has been suggested of its being abused by them. Although this scheme of erecting the General Government on the authority of the State Legislatures has been fatal to the Federal establishment, it would seem as if many gentlemen still foster the dangerous idea.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris observed that the States might make false returns, and then make no provisions for new elections.

The view of these gentlemen as condensed in the language of the section above quoted, was agreed to by the convention, and is now a part of our fundamental law.

Some may have fallen into the error of supposing that Congressional authority under this section of the Constitution is limited to include merely the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives; but such supposition is not correct. Congress is given full power to make and alter any State regulation governing the time and manner of electing Senators; and it is a pertinent fact that under this very constitutional provision Congress did enact the law of July 25, 1866, fixing specifically the time and manner of electing Senators. (Revised Statutes of the United States, Title II, chapter 1, sections 14 to 19, inclusive.)

The necessity for this legislation had become apparent by the occurrence of some of the very conditions predicted by Mr. Madison, viz: that the State Legislatures "might fail or refuse to consult the common interest." The necessity for the law of Congress referred to will be found discussed in the debates of the Thirty-ninth Congress, when the law was passed.

It may be observed in passing that, in view of the fact that certain States now have but a partial representation in this Senate, it is a matter worthy of careful consideration whether additional legislation by Congress ought not to be enacted, under this same power, looking to the prevention in future of the occurrence of such an anomaly as that now existing—evidenced by the vacant seats now seen in this Senate, from Washington, Montana, and Wyoming.

There has never been any serious question as to the scope and meaning of this constitutional provision among statesmen and jurists, and if there had been such question, the contemporaneous construction given by the Constitution-makers a century ago, as has been before stated, ought to be sufficiently explicit. But if this construction were not definite and conclusive as determining the true interpretation, the concurrent opinions of great constitutional authorities, followed by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, have so emphatically and explicitly sustained the constitutionality of the election laws which are now sought to be repealed, that their continuance upon the statute books is simply a question of necessity or propriety, and not of constitutionality.

An eminent writer upon constitutional questions, Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in his Constitutional History of the United States, referring to this section of the Constitution, says:

This provision originated with the committee of detail; but as it was reported by them, there was no other authority reserved to Congress itself than that of altering the regulations of the States, and this authority extended as well to the place of choosing the Senators as to all the other circumstances of the election. In the Convention, however, the authority of Congress was extended beyond the alteration of State regulations, so as to embrace a power to make rules as well as to alter those made by the States. But the place of choosing the Senators was excepted altogether from this restraining authority and left to the States. Mr. Madison, in his minutes, adds the explanation that the power of Congress to make regulations was supplied in order to enable them to regulate the elections if the State should fail or refuse to do so. But the text of the Constitution, as finally settled, gives authority to Congress "at any time" to "make or alter such regulations;" and this would seem to confer a power which, when exercised, must be paramount, whether a State regulation exists at the time or not. (Constitutional History of the United States, volume 1, pages 479, 480.)

Observe Mr. Curtis's language, "must be paramount whether a State regulation exists at the time or not." This construction or interpretation accords precisely with that found in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by Justice Bradley, Justices Clifford and Field dissenting, in the case of Siebold (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. R., 371), from which the following extracts are taken:

After first authorizing the States to prescribe the regulations, it is added, the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations. "Make or alter!" What is the plain meaning of these words? If not under the prepossession of some abstract theory of the relations between the State and national governments, we should not have any difficulty in understanding them. There is no declaration that the regulations shall be made either wholly by the State Legislatures or wholly by Congress. If Congress does not interfere, of course they may be made wholly by the State; but if it chooses to interfere, there is nothing in the words to prevent its doing so, either wholly or partially.

On the contrary, their necessary implication is that it may do either. It may either make the regulations or it may alter them. If it only alters, leaving, as manifest convenience requires, the general organization of the polls to the State, there results a necessary coöperation of the two governments in regulating the subject, but no repugnance in the system of regulations can arise thence, for the power of Congress over the subject is paramount. It may be exercised as and when Congress sees fit to exercise it. When exercised, the action of Congress, so f r as it extends and conflicts with the regulations of the State, necessarily supersedes them. This is implied in the power to "make or alter." (Pages 383, 384.)

So in the case of laws for regulating the elections of Representatives to Congress. The State may make regulations on the subject; Congress may make regulations on the same subject, or may alter or add to those already made. The paramount character of those made by Congress has the effect to supersede those made by the State so far as the two are inconsistent, and no further. There is no such conflict between them as to prevent their forming a harmonious system perfectly capable of being administered and carried out as such. (Page 386.)

The objection that the laws and regulations, the violation of which is made punishable by the acts of Congress, are State laws and have not been adopted by Congress is no sufficient answer to the power of Congress to impose punishment. It is true that Congress has not deemed it necessary to interfere with the duties of the ordinary officers of election, but has been content to leave them as prescribed by State laws. It has only created additional sanctions for their performance, and provided means of supervision in order more effectually to secure such performance. The imposition of punishment implies a prohibition of the act punished. The State laws which Congress sees no occasion to alter, but which it allows to stand, are in effect adopted by Congress. It simply demands their fulfillment. Content to leave the laws as they are, it is not content with the means provided for their enforcement. It provides additional means for that purpose, and we think it is entirely within its constitutional power to do so. It is simply the exercise of the power to make additional regulation. (Pages 388, 389.)

In the case, Ex parte Siebold, the court ruled in regard to the power of Congress to treat State officers, while conducting elections, as officers of the United States. The court says:

It is objected that Congress has no power to enforce State laws or to punish State officers, and especially has no power to punish them for violating the laws of their own State. As a general proposition this is undoubtedly true, but when in the performance of their functions State officers are called to fulfill duties which they owe to the United States as well as to the State, has the former no means of compelling such fulfillment?

In view of the fact that Congress has plenary and paramount jurisdiction over the whole subject, it seems almost absurd to say that an officer who receives or has custody of the ballots given for a Representative owes no duty to the National Government which Congress can enforce, or that an officer who stuffs the ballot box can not be made amenable to the United States. If Congress has not, prior to the passage of the present laws, imposed any penalties to prevent and punish frauds and violations of duty committed by officers of election it has been because the exigency has not been deemed sufficient to require it, and not because Congress has not the requisite power. (Pages 387, 388.)

They also decided that it conferred upon Congress the power to appoint officers of its own to act as police at the polls where a member of Congress is being chosen, for the preservation of order, and for the protection of the electors in their right to freely and peaceably cast their ballots.

The counsel for the petitioners concede that Congress, if it sees fit, assume the entire control and regulation of the election of Representatives. This would necessarily involve the appointment of the places for holding the polls, the time for voting, and the officers for holding the election; it would require the regulation of the duties to be performed, the custody of the ballots, the mode of ascertaining the result, and every other matter relating to the subject. Is it possible that Congress could not, in that case, provide for keeping the peace at such elections, and for arresting and punishing those guilty of breaking it?

If it could not its power would be but a shadow and a name. But if Congress can do this, where is the difference in principle in its making provision for securing the preservation of the peace, so as to give to every citizen his free right to vote without molestation or injury, when it assumes only to supervise the regulations made by the State, and not to supersede them entirely? In our judgment there is no difference; and if the power exists in the one case it exists in the other. (Ex parte Siebold, p. 396.)

In Ex parte Yarborough (110 U. S. R., 657), in the opinion of the court, delivered by Justice Miller, without dissent, the power of Congress under this clause of the Constitution was quite fully discussed.

The court says:

That a government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elected, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly, has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud, is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the greatest consideration.

If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the General Government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption.

If it has not this power it is left helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics, open violence and insidious corruption. (Pages 657, 658.)

Will it be denied that it is in the power of that body to provide laws for the proper conduct of those elections? To provide, if necessary, the officers who shall conduct them and make return of the result; and especially to provide in an election held under its own authority for security of life and limb to the voter while in the exercise of this function? Can it be doubted that Congress can by law protect the act of voting, the place where it is done, and the man who votes from personal violence or intimidation and the election itself from corruption and fraud?

If this be so, and it is not doubted, are such powers annulled because an election for State officers is held at the same time and place? Is it any less important that the election of members of Congress should be the free choice of all the electors because State officers are to be elected at the same time? (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. R., 371.)

These questions answer themselves; and it is only because the Congress of the United States, through long habits and long years of forbearance has, in deference and respect to the State, refrained from the exercise of these powers that they are now doubted.

But when, in the pursuance of a new demand for action, that body, as it did in the cases just enumerated, finds it necessary to make additional laws for the free, the pure, and the safe exercise of this right of voting they stand upon the same ground and are to be upheld for the same reasons. (Pages 661, 662.)

If this were conceded, the importance to the General Government of having the actual elections—the voting for those members—free from force and fraud is not diminished by the circumstance that the qualification of the voter is determined by the law of the State where he votes. It equally affects the Government; it is as indispensable to the proper discharge of the great function of legislating for that Government that those who are to control this legislation shall not owe their election to bribery or violence, whether the class of persons who shall vote is determined by the law of the State or by the law of the United States, or by their united result. (Page 663.)

If the Government of the United States has within its constitutional domain no authority to provide against these evils, if the very sources of power may be poisoned by corruption or controlled by violence and outrage without legal restraint, then, indeed, is the country in danger, and its best powers, its highest purposes, the hopes which it inspires, and the love which enshrines it, are at the mercy of the combinations of those who respect no right but brute force, on the one hand, and unprincipled corruptionists on the other. (Page 667.)

These quotations from the law of the land (for I apprehend that no Senator will insist that any final decision of the Supreme Court is not the law of the land) would seem to be complete in substance and in terms as to the fact of the constitutionality of the so-called Federal election laws.

What, then, Mr. President, is the cause of the present demand for the repeal of those laws? Has any man suffered any injustice by reason of their existence or because of their enforcement? Has any person been wronged by laws which were intended to prevent wrong? Has any citizen been hindered or prevented from the exercise of any of his constitutional rights or prerogatives by statutes which were intended solely to preserve and maintain those rights? Every Senator will concede and claim that the exercise of the elective franchise should be maintained free from intimidation, fraud, and wrongdoing; should be protected by some adequate and competent authority.

In all elections where officers of State concern alone are being voted for it is no doubt the province and duty of the State to provide such legislative safeguards as may be required. But in elections where the interests of the United States are involved so closely, as in the case of Representatives or Senators, where the person elected is to be charged with the duty of legislating for the United States, who is to be sworn in as a legislator of the United States, and whose oath of office binds him solely to the execution of the office to which he is elected, and to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," it seems to me to be conclusive as to the power and right, as well as to the duty of the Congress of the United States, to provide by appropriate legislation the proper safeguards for such elections as well as to adequately protect alike the individual citizen and the aggregate body politic of the United States.

The contention of those who urge the repeal of these laws seems to be based mainly upon the theory that the States alone are charged with the matter of police control of elections and that the Federal Government has no call to interfere even for the protection of its own direct and most important interests. They insist that the United States must rely upon the several States for the guaranty that the elections of Representatives and Senators in Congress shall be properly and honestly conducted. If this be the true rule, Mr. President, why does the Constitution give to Congress the right to "make or alter" the prescription of the State Legislatures regarding the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives?"

Is it to be presumed that the fundamental law of a government will preclude that government from maintaining itself and leave it subject in its most vital and important part to the possible neglect or unfriendly act of an individual recalcitrant member; in other words, to the dictation or adverse action of a single State?

I apprehend that no Senator will fail to perceive that this discussion brings us back to the identical question which our friends in the South attempted to settle at Sumter on that April day in 1861, and which reached a final settlement in 1865. It is the question of State rights and State sovereignty as against and above the power of the United States. It is the question whether this Government is simply a league between the States, revocable at the will of any State, or a Government having the right to exist and the power to control the means necessary to its existence.

Shall the election of its Representatives and Senators in Congress be subject alike to the frauds and outrages of the judicial ruffians and the ward bullies to be found in imperial States and in metropolitan cities? Shall the mandate of a corrupt judge, or the order of a Maynard, determine the complexion of a Legislature which elects a Senator to this body? Shall the brawn and muscle of a McKane, in defiance of courts and laws, control next year the election of Representatives in Congress, and Congress have no power to protect by law the integrity of its own membership?

In other words, Mr. President, is there to be no power in the hands of Congress, by which it may maintain in a degree the integrity and purity of the determination of its own membership, or must it be ever subject to the frauds and wrongs which State laws have failed to prevent?

I beg to call the attention of the Senate to an instance within my own observation and in my own State where the value and importance of the law creating supervisors of election was fully demonstrated. It may not be so generally known throughout the country as it is in Illinois and in Chicago that, but for one feature of this law, a feature simple and proper, the political complexion of this American Senate would in the year 1885 have been fraudulently changed from Republican to Democratic. I am not sure whether it would have actually changed the majority, but it was very close at that time. This important and far-reaching result would have unquestionably followed from a theft of a few ballots and the forging of a tally sheet in a single voting precinct of the Eighteenth ward in the city of Chicago had not the personal and record evidence of the two assistant supervisors who officiated in that precinct pointed out the fraud and forgery in the investigation of this important case by the United States authorities in the court presided over by Judge H. W. Blodgett, who is now or has been one of the counsel for the United States in the recent Bering Sea arbitration case.

The facts were developed that a sufficient number of ballots cast for Henry W. Leman for State senator had been abstracted from the sealed package returned to the county canvassers from the second precinct of the Eighteenth ward in Chicago; that a large number of fraudulent, false, and forged ballots had been substituted therefor, bearing the name of Rudolph Brand for State senator, to defeat Leman and carry the senatorial election in favor of Rudolph Brand. Had this fraudulent return been sustained and Brand been seated as State senator, the Illinois Legislature would have had a Democratic majority, and the seat in the Senate of my lamented colleague and friend, Gen. John A. Logan, would have been filled by a Democratic Senator, and, if I remember correctly, this would have made the United States Senate Democratic in politics at that time.

The sworn and honest returns of the two assistant supervisors, one a Democrat and the other a Republican, furnished the proof which pointed out the manner of the fraud, and immediately directed suspicion to the guilty persons. In due time the entire chain of evidence was developed, and after an exhaustive trial in the United States court they were convicted and sentenced to prison. The trial was presided over by United States District Judge H. W. Blodgett, to whom I referred a while ago, and among the counsel for the defendants was a renowned lawyer from an adjacent State, who is now a distinguished Senator in this body.

This noted case, widely known as the "Mackin election fraud," is only a single one of a long list of election outrages committed in many of the large cities of the country, a recital of which would only emphasize the need for more efficient Federal control of such elections as may affect the membership of either of the two Houses of Congress.

It is a matter of indifference which of the great political parties may be charged, for the time being, with the execution of these laws; but it is a matter of the highest importance that somebody, some official authority, of whatever shade in politics, shall be required to enforce laws for the protection of the franchise.

It is idle for the Congress of the United States to sit supinely down, contented with the false theory that the States have full control of the franchise and the protection of the ballot; until by adverse State legislation, or by nonlegislation, the very highest privilege of the sovereign citizen is violated or rendered nugatory and valueless. It is a policy fundamentally wrong and indefensible in that, if carried to its legimate extent, it falls in line with the arguments once used in justification for the disruption of the Union, the secession of the several States.

I desire to emphasize the statement that a national government which has not the power within itself to protect its own membership, and to have some control over their election, is as weak as water and can not very long endure.

This great country has reached its present high position by its constant jealousy of and impatience with everything which tends to narrow the boundaries or limit the scope of the rights of the peaceful citizen in his exercise of the sovereignty, which is his inalienable prerogative. By implication every voting citizen is not only entitled to cast an honest ballot, but have it honestly counted. If this right is liable to be infringed and interfered with, is it not the duty of the Government to protect it by legislation, using only such statutory machinery as shall seem adapted to effect the purpose?

The necessity for some ample and competent authority, with recognized power behind it, to enforce lawful enactments; an authority dictated by enlightened civilization for the protection of the agency which above all others should be maintained pure and unstained; to see that the paper ballot, from the time it leaves the hands of the voter until it has reached an honest count and an honest announcement, shall be inviolable and unimpeachable, would seem to be imperative and unquestionable. Such necessity is so apparent, as a matter of popular concern and not as a partisan claim, that I am astonished that any serious opposition to the principle should develop here as a partisan measure. I can not believe that any Senator who now listens to me will disagree with me upon the abstract question of the power of the Government to legislate for the protection of that ballot which may affect the election of a Representative in Congress.

If the existing Federal election laws are imperfect, or work injustice, amend or modify them, but do not sweep from the statutes all legislation which tends to effectuate the honest expression of the will of the people.

An honest American ballot is the strongest, the most herculean power in the world. That ballot, that great agency which creates an American President and an American Congress, builds a structure which the powers of the earth can not destroy. The American people, endowed with the honest ballot, are omnipotent against emperors and kings. But how weak and puny, how powerless and unrespected is that ballot which bears the taint of fraud or wrong. Those who profit and benefit by it are ashamed of it, and those who lose or suffer by it are outraged and injured. Only one power may properly prevent; only one authority can protect and remedy. Logically and rightfully the Congress of the United States must maintain and protect the integrity of the election of members of the House of Representatives under that constitutional clause which gives to Congress the power to make or alter State regulations prescribing the times, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, except only as to places of choosing Senators.

Let me add that the power given to Congress carries with it the power to use whatever force may be necessary in the protection of the voter and of the vote when it is attempted to be cast.

A very ardent advocate of the repeal of the election laws, in a recent speech in another forum, urges that the "right of suffrage and conditions of suffrage are subject to the laws of the State of the citizen, and must be prescribed and limited by such State." This premise may in itself be correct, but the deduction, that the question of the right to vote being left to the State the determination of such right ought therefore to be exercised only by the power that gave it, viz, the State, does not follow.

There are various rights and privileges granted by the State, but it does not follow that the State alone shall determine the exercise of such right and privileges. Some State officers are elected solely by the State, and their powers and duties are usually governed and directed by State laws, yet from the year 1787 down to this day, they have been charged with duties and responsibilities by the Federal Government; duties and responsibilities adhering to them by virtue of their qualification as State officers under State laws. By the Constitution of the United States we find that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land, * * * anything in the Constitution or laws of any State notwithstanding. The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and all judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath and affirmation to support this Constitution.

By Federal statutes, enacted as early as the years 1789 and 1793, offenders against the United States may—by any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any State where he may be found, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as has cognizance of the offense.

Here is a case where by direct operation of one of the oldest existing statutes, a State officer is clothed with Federal jurisdiction. Does this work any hardship or detract in any way from the power of the State? So, by analogy, may not and do not the Federal statutes bearing upon the election of Representatives in Congress confer upon the election officers appointed by the State a specific Federal duty? And if so, may not Congress with equal authority appoint specially supervisors and marshals or other agents to protect the interest of the General Government?

In the case of the Chicago election frauds, heretofore referred to, the trial court specifically decided during the progress of the trial that the officers of the election, as well as the county clerk and his subordinates, charged under State law with the custody of the ballots after the election, were amenable to the Federal law, although the frauds committed upon the ballots, and the forgery of the tally sheets as well as the fraudulent return, did not defeat the election of the Representative in Congress who was voted for upon the genuine ballot.

A notary public in a State is a State officer, but he may administer the oath of office to a Federal official, as also may a judge or justice of any State court. So it will be seen that these magistrates are charged with certain Federal functions. So in the election of Senators the act of July 25, 1866, directs the time and manner of such elections, and specifically fixes the duty of the executive of the State and of each legislative house in connection with such election and its certification. For these purposes the governor and State legislator are properly charged with a Federal duty.

In cases of contested elections of members of Congress, the Federal statutes have for many years authorized State and municipal magistrates and notaries public to issue subpœnas, and to take and verify testimony, for a distinctively Federal purpose, and to prescribe penalties for violation. The Presidential electors of each State are chosen by the voters of the State, but the Congress, by law, directs as to the manner by which they shall perform their duties. The messengers appointed to convey the certificates of their votes to the President of the Senate are compensated by the United States, and for any neglect to perform properly the service required are subject to a penal forfeiture of a thousand dollars to the United States, although upon the theory of those who urge the repeal of the election laws the State alone has the power to direct and control the exercise of the functions of the Presidential elector, because the State controls the election of such officers.

There are various other illustrations of the theory which has recently been set up by those favoring the breaking down of the barriers separating lawlessness and crime from decency and an honest ballot.

It occurs to me that our Democratic friends are not exercising their usual shrewdness, just upon their accession to political control of the country, by overthrowing salutary regulations which will be placed under their own control. As a Republican, I would much rather have such a system of laws, meant and intended solely for the proper protection of the honest and legitimate voter, even if every official agency for their enforcement shall be of the Democratic party. I have not so lost faith in American citizenship as to believe that the sworn officers of any political party will ignore the requirements of wise and just election laws. Better such a system, by whomsoever it may be administered, than to be without law and without hindrance to the criminal acts of the vicious and depraved class. Do not break down and destroy the restraints and barriers which offer some obstruction to the frauds and crimes which seek the ballot as the weak point in the political armor of the American system.

Are our politicians so pure as to walk always in the straight and narrow path of honesty? Is it true that no laws are needed to protect the purity of the ballot, and to punish outrages thereon? To this question it is not necessary to go back to the early days to find the answer. It is not necessary to go to Arkansas, or to Mississippi, or to those other places in the South where the people think they have grievances sufficient to justify them in stifling a free ballot. It is not necessary to go into the black parishes, where it may be supposed that the ignorance and vicious habits of the colored voters require the wholesome restraint of the White Caps to insure that they vote right, or that their votes be counted right.

No, indeed; it is only necessary to go into the enlightened State of New York to find volumes of proof of the inability, of the indisposition of the State to guarantee an honest casting and true counting of honest votes. Does it not bring the blush of shame to the cheek of American Senators to think even of the public fact of the gigantic frauds upon decency, the monstrous outrages upon the elective franchise which have been perpetrated within the last few months in that great Commonwealth whose borders are almost within sight of the statue upon the Capitol? What a disgrace to the American bar and what a humiliation to the judiciary of a noble State has become the name of that judge, the tool and willing agent, who sold his judicial birthright for a mess of miserable political pottage! A high officer of the State of New York, a deputy attorney-general, to effectuate a gigantic outrage, is said to have abstracted from the office of the State comptroller the sacred records or returns of an election which had given a Republican majority in a certain senatorial district, and by this theft, aided by collateral acts similar in character affecting other districts, succeeded in reversing the political status of the State senate.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CULLOM. I do, though not for a speech.

Mr. HILL. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the result of the contested-election case to which he refers could not have controlled the membership of the senate of the State of New York?

Mr. CULLOM. So far as that interrogatory is concerned, if the Senator simply proposes to justify that action by the declaration that that contested election would not have controlled the politics of the State of New York, I regard it as no sufficient question to be asked in this case, because if it was a crime, whether it decided the party majority in the Legislature of that State or not, neither the Senator nor any other man should justify it.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator indulge me in a further observation?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Whether or not there was anything irregular or criminal in the action in that senatorial district is a question which will be discussed at the proper time, and one as to which the Senator, of course, does not expect me to answer him now; but the point he was trying to make seemed to be that the action in that district had effected the control of the senate of the State of New York; and upon that point I beg to inform the Senator that his statement is not true.

Mr. CULLOM. Whether the statement is exactly true or not——

Mr. HILL. It is neither exactly true nor substantially true.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not say that it was actually true; but it probably required two or three changes in order to get control of that Legislature and secure in one way or another the election of a senator friendly to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. The election of United States Senator had nothing whatever to do with that question, except in a very slight degree. If the district to which the Senator refers had been given to the Republicans, or two of the districts which were contested, the Democratic majority in the assembly was sufficient to elect my distinguished colleague to this body. That question had nothing whatever to do with the control of the Senatorship from the State of New York.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I understand the facts to be—of course I yield to the Senator so far as familiarity with the facts is concerned——

Mr. HILL. I do not say that the Senator wilfully misstates the facts.

Mr. CULLOM. No.

Mr. HILL. I presume he has simply taken the partial accounts in the partisan newspapers of our State.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not relied especially upon newspaper accounts, but I have understood, and I think the country has understood, that the action of that man, who afterwards became a judge, inaugurated a scheme which resulted in changing the character of that Legislature.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inform the Senator, and the country at the same time, that that is not a correct statement of the situation.

Mr. CULLOM. We shall see.

Mr. HILL. At the proper time I shall reply to the Senator; but I do not wish to further interrupt him now.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall proceed.

In the course of events this man very soon became, by appointment, an associate justice of the court of appeals of the State of New York, a court which, by tradition and by the merited high character and reputation of its members, had ranked as high as any judicial tribunal in America, except the Supreme Court of the United States. As a further repayment for the miserable crime to which I have referred, the State convention of a great political party, held at Saratoga on the 15th of September last, by a vote of 398 to 1 nominated Isaac H. Maynard for its candidate, to continue in office as judge of the court of appeals. Six or seven weeks later the people of the State of New York constituted themselves a higher court of appeals, and by a majority approximating a hundred thousand votes they said to Isaac H. Maynard, as Sir Matthew Hale, chief justice of the king's bench, said to a corrupt and dishonest judge: "Take off your judicial robes and come down from that seat which you are in no wise worthy to hold."

Mr. President and Senators, what Joseph Mackin attempted and nearly accomplished in Chicago in 1884 by the theft, fraud, and forgery which I have before alluded to was, as I believe, consummated in New York in 1892 by Maynard and his associates. It is believed that a seat in the American Senate has to trace its title to an act upon which the people of New York have fixed the indelible stamp of infamy and wrong and crime. And the seal of lasting condemnation bears the verification, not of Republicans alone, but of high minded, able, honest, and most respected Democrats. The Bar Association of the State of New York, the highest unofficial fraternity of legal minds in this country, out of respect to their own honor and integrity, took cognizance of this infamy.

That bar association appointed a committee to consider the question not of political propriety, but of professional decency involved in the possible election of such a man to that exalted judgeship. That committee was composed of such men as Frederick R. Coudert, Democrat: James C. Carter, Democrat; John E. Parsons, Democrat; Clifford A. Hand, Democrat; William B. Hornblower, Democrat; Albert Stickney, Democrat; Edmund R. Robinson, Democrat; Elihu Root, Republican.

And after much consideration and care they reported that Maynard and his confrères had tainted an honored profession, and had filled seats in the New York Legislature by infamous outrage and fraud.

This Congress has nothing to do with Maynard's alleged crime, except as it presents a most marked instance of the necessity of providing all possible safeguards for the ballot, even in our most enlightened States. It gives me great pleasure to say that in this noted case in New York, as well as in the one referred to in Chicago, many of the very best Democratic citizens took earnest and positive part in bringing to justice the perpetrators of the great wrongs. Many of them felt that the reproach which attached to their party on account of it was so great that it was a duty that they owed to an outraged public to do their utmost towards its punishment. And the voice of the November election showed that thousands of conscientious Democrats waived their partisanship to give emphatic earnestness to their votes.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to claim that the United States Government ought to regulate the election of members of the Legislatures of the various States because the senators and members of those Legislatures participate in the election of United States Senators?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not claimed any such thing.

Mr. HILL. I thought the drift of the Senator's argument was in that direction.

Mr. CULLOM. I said, upon the contrary, that Congress has nothing to do with Maynard's crime except as it presents a most marked instance of the necessity of providing all possible safeguards for the ballot, even in our most enlightened States.

Mr. HILL. What has that to do with the question of the repeal of the Federal election laws?

Mr. CULLOM. As I have already said, while the Congress of the United States may not have any power to control the election of State legislators, it has the unquestionable power to control the elections for members of the National House of Representatives, and it has under the Constitution also the power, when the Legislature comes to elect a Senator, to control that also, as we have already done by the act of Congress passed in 1866.

Even now, within a week, upon the complaint of a New York Democrat, an honest high court has been found which has rendered a decision bringing the violators of the law and decency nearer and nearer to the penitentiary, as evidenced by the following paragraph cut from a New York newspaper:

SENATE STEAL TO BE PROBED—THE STATE BOARD OF CANVASSERS MUST ANSWER FOR CONTEMPT.

ALBANY, December 6.

The general term has overruled Judge Edwards in the Mylod return cases. Judge Mayham dissenting. Judge Herrick wrote the opinion.

The case was the People, ex rel. Platt, against the State board of canvassers, and was for an order to show cause why the board should not be punished for contempt in canvassing the Dutchess County returns in 1891, by which the Democrats were enabled to steal control of the senate.

But wrongdoing and crime run at high speed, while justice follows at a walk. While justice and law are being invoked to punish the perpetrators, what do we see as a result of their crimes? Where do we find the culmination of all this fraud, rascality, thievery, and outrage? What was its ultimate purpose and object? I hesitate to voice the answer; but it is here. I feel shocked to even think of it. I pause at its utterance when it involves a spectacle which almost challenges the credulity of the imagination. I would for the honor of American citizenship, for the respect I have for American manhood, that I might give some other answer, but the fact is plain.

The crystallized result of all this venality and infamy is blazoned upon the roll of membership of the Senate of the United States, and all the frantic zeal of a partisan majority can never efface it. It blots the page of history, and shrouds in shame the proud commonwealth which had honored this Chamber by names like De Witt Clinton, William L. Marcy, Silas Wright, John A. Dix, and William H. Seward. It is no reflection upon the personal or official honor of any member of this body that he may happen to be the innocent beneficiary of his seat because of some wrongdoing by another, for according to law and precedent he may legally and rightfully hold his seat without question. But the offense and the punishment remain subject to the law of the land. President Arthur was the rightful President of the United States, although he became such by a cruel murder. The punishment of Guiteau cast no reflection upon the title to the Presidency. But the offense remained, and it must be dealt with by the legal power.

So I say, all good people everywhere in America, regardless of their political affiliations, should join as one man to perpetuate, to make stronger and more efficient every guard and protection for honest elections. Do not relapse into barbarism, but keep pace with the age in which we live. Break down anarchy and build up society.

And now, Mr. President, to my brother Senators upon the other side of this Chamber I have to present some words of earnestness, not specially bearing upon the election laws alone. I wish calmly and without disrespect to say to you what my fellow Senators upon this side believe, what the great majority of the people of many of the States believe, and what I candidly and sincerely believe, in regard to the present situation in the United States.

The present Administration, and the majority party in this Congress are building up a feeling in every neighborhood, hamlet, town, and city in the Northern States, which will, whenever it can find expression, reach every man who by his voice or vote is aiding the direct warfare now being made upon the prosperity of the people of this country. The public indignation, not confined by any means to the members of my own party, has reached an intensity almost unequaled since 1861. The people are alarmed, and, Mr. President, their apprehension and alarm are justified by the unprecedented action of the Executive and the impending reckless legislation which is threatened. The entire country, without regard to locality, and the great mass of the people, without regard to party affiliation, stand aghast at the evidences which are piling higher and higher every day of the total incapacity of the party in power to deal with public questions of the most vital importance to the people of a suffering country.

The proposed repeal of the election laws is an important one of the proposed steps in the mad rush toward barbarism which the irresponsible elements of the Democratic party advocated and adopted at Chicago. But important as this may be, its effect is but a ripple upon the surface of public sentiment, compared with that which has raised the very ocean of public indignation. The public welfare is menaced by an attempt to break down a most wholesome tariff system. Vast interests are frightened into stagnation, and ruin threatens the industries of a great people. Mills are idle, our shops are closed; while the agents of foreign countries, the manufacturers of England and the Continent, and the importers of foreign goods and wares, are jubilant and joyous, in the prospect that the acts which strike terror over our entire country are going to start afresh the looms and spindles and hammers of Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and Hamburg.

We have scriptural authority for saying that the man who does not provide for his own "is worse than an infidel," and quite as true must be the statement that the legislator who does not protect the interests of his country is worse than a traitor. This reference to British interests and foreign influence can not be met by sneers and ridicule. Is there no significance in the fact that every British newspaper of consequence, on the day following the delivery of the President's message in Congress indulged in laudation of the President's tariff policy, and rejoiced in the bright prospect of the adoption of the work of the House Ways and Means Committee? And as a counterpart to these expressions from across the Atlantic, I intend upon a proper occasion soon to present to this Senate quotations from some of the letters I am daily receiving from anxious citizens all over the Mississippi Valley, bearing the touching story of the universal fear, which has truly reached the stage of terror, at the future prospect shadowed out in the course outlined by the majority of this Congress.

What else than terror and despair can we expect judging by the policy which could wantonly crush American industry and shipwreck the interwoven interests of American capital and American labor with one hand, while with the other it tears down the American ensign which had spread its protecting folds peacefully over a struggling colony upon an island of the sea?

An act which all the powers of monarchical Europe could not have accomplished was committed by an order of an American President upon the advice and recommendation of a newly baptized Democratic Secretary of State. Should it hereafter appear that the present envoy to Honolulu, Mr. Willis, has duly performed his appointed duty, and caused the reënthronement of the ex-Queen of the Sandwich Islands, the President and the Secretary will wish that the Hawaiian mountains might speedily fall upon them.

To what element of the people of this country has this Administration endeared itself by its pension policy? Where in all the broad domain of this Union will be found the single precinct or district which shall sustain it, unless it be some locality where no soldier of the Union is to be found?

Then, in addition to the tearing down of the election laws, the tearing down of the protective tariff, the tearing down of the American flag, and the tearing down of the pension policy, the national-bank system is to be torn down, and the 10 per cent tax upon State-bank issues is to be torn away.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator expect to prevent the country from realizing the dire effect he has mentioned by a continuance of the Federal election law?

Mr. CULLOM. As I say, that is one of the steps that is taken, the end of which will be the destruction of every single act that I have referred to, which will break down the industries and the very life of this nation. Does the Senator desire to ask any further questions?

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will permit me, I will avail myself of the opportunity. I understood the Senator a few moments ago to refer to the recent election in the State of New York as a condemnation of certain political methods or results. I understand him now to claim that the election was a vindication of the Republican protective policy.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that all?

Mr. HILL. I should like to have the Senator define specially which it was.

Mr. CULLOM. I do say that the conduct which I have described as having occurred in the State of New York, which, in my judgment, gave a majority to the Democracy in that State and which resulted in the election of a Democratic Senator, has been condemned by the people of the State of New York by nearly a hundred thousand majority in defeating the Democratic candidate for judge of the court of appeals.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has not answered the question.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I have.

Mr. HILL. Had the election anything to do with the question of the tariff?

Mr. CULLOM. The election had nothing to do with the question of the tariff except that the Democratic party declared in convention, and have been ever since declaring, that they intend to carry out what they had proclaimed in their platform at Chicago, and that alarmed the people and helped to give the majorities which have been recently cast in favor of the Republican party and against Democracy.

Mr. HILL. As I understand the Senator, then, he thinks the question of the tariff was only very remotely involved in the recent election in New York. I desire to state to him, what I think the country well knows, that the question of the tariff was directly, substantially, and wholly involved, in connection with the issue of a larger and more extensive election law in the election of 1892, when the State of New York by nearly 50,000 majority cast its vote for tariff reform, and on a full vote, too.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not said at any time, and do not say now, that the election went off upon the question of the repeal of the election laws. I do say, however, that as to the candidate for judge, who seemed to be so much the friend of the honorable Senator from New York, he was defeated by a larger majority because of the belief on the part of those people that he had been corrupt in his office than he would have been if he had not been so regarded.

Mr. HILL. Allow me again——

Mr. CULLOM. But I desire to say furthermore——

The PRESIDENT protempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not want the Senator to interrupt me all the time.

Mr. HILL. I will not.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say, furthermore, that while that is true, the people of New York, as the people of Massachusetts and Iowa, felt that if it was to be the policy of the Democratic party to carry out its platform they would vote against the party, as they did in those States, and also in the State of Ohio, because they wanted to put their seal of condemnation upon the policy that was intended to be carried out by the Democratic party.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inform the Senator——

The PRESIDENT protempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The Senator need not lie awake nights over any anxiety upon the subject as to whether the Democratic party proposes to carry out its platform upon the question of the tariff. I can assure him that the party does intend to carry it out faithfully, honestly, and impartially. So much for that.

Mr. CULLOM. Well.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the Senator has spoken of the recent candidate for judge of the court of appeals in my State as my friend. I do not deny that he was and is my friend, but I say in the changes in political affairs which are incident to politics it does not necessarily follow that because a party is defeated there is a personal condemnation of men. Charles J. Folger was your friend, sir, and the friend of your side, and yet in the incidents of politics he ran for governor of our State against the present Chief Executive of the nation, and the party to which you belong was beaten by the largest majority ever given in the history of the Empire State—192,000 majority. But I never heard anyone say that it was a personal condemnation of the distinguished man who was defeated.

Mr. CULLOM. Neither have I.

Mr. HILL. Then we agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. Now, if the Senator is through I want to assure him that I am not lying awake nights as much as he is on account of what the Democrats are going to do.

Mr. HILL. I thought you were.

Mr. CULLOM. Not at all. I think the Senator himself is a good deal more disturbed by the condition of affairs as it affects the Democratic party.

Mr. HILL. Not the slightest. The worry is all on your side.

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad to know the Senator is so quiet and calm. Now, I repeat that the people, where they had the opportunity of voting in the recent election, voted with the facts staring them in the face, not only in New York as to the election of a judge, but that the tariff laws, the banking laws, the election laws were all to be put in jeopardy if the Democratic party carried out its pledges at its national convention at Chicago, and because they believed that they voted more largely the Republican ticket than they have done for a good many years past.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me again?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; if it will please the Senator, I will.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to concede that the question in reference to the election laws, the question of the tariff, and the other questions to which he alluded were all directly involved in the election of 1892.

Mr. CULLOM. I had not said anything about those elections, but I agree to it.

Mr. HILL. I am specially referring to the election of 1892, the Presidential election, upon a full vote. I think there were some national questions involved in that election.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. It was not merely a question of personality between candidates.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly not.

Mr. HILL. Upon those questions which were involved on a full vote throughout the country the people voted with the Democratic party in spite of all your Federal election laws. Is not that true?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Now, does the Senator say that because of the election held this fall in four or five States, most of them Republican, some of whom did not cast their votes for the Democratic candidates, there was any change in the sentiments of the great majority of the people of this country?

Mr. CULLOM. Is the Senator through now?

Mr. HILL. For the present.

Mr. CULLOM. Well, Mr. President, it is true that a majority of the people voted the Democratic ticket in 1892; a plurality, rather, not a majority. But as soon as they woke up the day after the election and found what had happened, they repented, and they have been repenting ever since.

As if the other acts of destruction were not sufficient to satisfy the demon of organized ruin, the currency of the country, the last relic of stable value, is to be demoralized and destroyed. What, in God's name, will be left to make the United States worth living in if, after the other cyclones have done their worst, the country is to be once again put at the mercy of a multitude of State-banking systems, as it was prior to the war of the rebellion? State Legislatures are to be left free to charter unlimited and uncontrolled banks of issue, and the choice securities for their circulating notes will be found to be the bonds of school districts, small municipalities, and other corporations, grading in market value from zero to par. How long will it be till sharp bankers will control the sparse population of some remote section in Arizona or elsewhere and issue bonds upon valueless territory as the basis for the issue of money "to help the farmers to move their crops," as I believe the Populists say.

In the State of Illinois and other States of the West we have gone through all that experience, and we had hoped that the hateful thing known as a "State-bank" system had gone to stay.

Mr. President and Senators, I may speak earnestly upon this subject, but the present unusual state of public affairs demands some proper recognition at the hands of this Congress. If any existing legislation works harshly or unjustly towards the peaceful citizen, change it, modify it, or correct it. But this crusade of general repeal, of general warfare upon systems under which we have been happy and prosperous is not the part of wisdom or of statesmanship. It is true such a policy as is now being pursued in this regard is driving the people by the thousands and hundreds of thousands into the Republican party, yet I am not so much a partisan as to wish success to my party to be built upon the ruin of my country.

I entreat the serious thinking men of the Democracy to call a halt in the wild campaign of error, and cause their reckless following to keep their hands from despoiling the work which has stood the test of time and which bears the stamp of value.

Every word spoken here reaches the open ears of millions of anxious and earnest Americans. The warm blood of every American heart pulsates in ready response to every vote given in this Congress, which bears upon interests and rights that have grown dear and almost sacred to all.

Let me say, Mr. President, according to the report made by officials in our own State, as I understand it, there are not less than 117,000 men out of employment and without bread in Chicago to-day, and the State is moving in the direction of trying to take care of those people until the industries can be started.

Mr. PALMER. Will my colleague allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. CULLOM. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. PALMER. Will my colleague kindly answer me two questions? The first is whether this speech of his is being made with a view to the Chicago election to occur next week?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not been considering the Chicago election since I have been on the floor.

Mr. PALMER. If it is, I shall have to withdraw the little arrangement between myself and my colleague, and go to Chicago and answer the speech there.

Mr. CULLOM. I will release the Senator if he desires to go.

Mr. PALMER. Still, I wish to ask the Senator if he can indicate what has been done by the Democratic party to produce the results he describes so well.

Mr. CULLOM. I can answer the Senator according to my judgment. The fact that the Democratic party is pledged and is moving in the direction of destroying the protective tariff laws this hour results in the fact that the mills and factories, and mines, if you please, are substantially closed, waiting to see what the action of this Congress is going to be upon that subject, and the result is that tens of thousands of laboring men are out of employment and can not get work.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CULLOM. Assuredly, if he will make his question a little shorter than he usually does.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall make no speech. I shall simply ask a question.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is it not true that a great many people were influenced to go to Chicago during the Fair time in the hope and expectation of getting employment?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is that short enough?

Mr. CULLOM. That is very short.

Mr. McPHERSON. Probably a hundred thousand and more of those out of employment, of whom the Senator speaks, went there under such circumstances. Is it possible for the Senator to believe that after the Fair had ended, after the labor and employment which they sought there and did perform and were paid for, places can be supplied for the 117,000 additional people by the industries of Chicago?

Mr. CULLOM. Is that all?

Mr. McPHERSON. That is all.

Mr. CULLOM. Are you through?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I want to be entirely candid with the Senator from New Jersey. I have no doubt that there are many men in Chicago who came there when mills and mines in other places were closed, hoping that they might find work because we had the World's Fair there. Probably a good many thousand people who are now out of work there came in in that way, as I have stated; but the testimony comes from all directions that mills and mines are closed and laboring men are out of work, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes; but if the Senator will bear with me, it was due very largely to a financial panic which afflicted this country during the past summer, all of which was owing to the unwise and vicious legislation of the party to which the honorable Senator belongs. If there had been no Sherman law upon the statute books probably we would have had no financial panic, and when the Senator undertakes to charge the Democratic party with this condition of things he is undertaking a very, very big job.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, is the Senator through?

Mr. McPHERSON. There was no panic in 1892 immediately after the vote was counted and canvassed, and President Cleveland was declared elected. No panic occurred until May or June of this year. If it is the tariff policy of the Democratic party which has produced the panic, why did not the panic start in November of last year, after President Cleveland had been declared elected upon the platform of which the Senator complains?

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question. I am aware that the Senator has insisted from the beginning that the law known as the Sherman act was responsible for all the ills that have befallen the country since Mr. Cleveland was elected, and I have no doubt the Senator will continue to repeat that story until Mr. Cleveland goes out of office, which will be in about three years. But, in the beginning, while I voted to repeal that act because many people believed it ought to be done and might be in the way, I said then in the remarks I made in the Senate, and I adhere to it now, that when the American people rose the next morning after the 8th of November a year ago and found that Mr. Cleveland was elected, with a Senate and a House both to support him, and that the President was put upon a platform in favor of repealing the protective tariff laws, in favor of repealing the 10 per cent tax on State banks, in favor of repealing the election laws, and almost every other thing that they could think of that the Republican party had ever done which gave to this country prosperity, right then the panic began slowly until it became a volume that shut up almost every mill and factory and mine in the country.

Mr. PALMER. Will my colleague allow me? We get along very nicely.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly we do.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask my colleague if he thinks it is possible in our State for a State bank to be established?

Mr. CULLOM. We have a constitutional provision in our State that prohibits State banks at present. That constitutional provision might be removed. Of course I do not know what the Legislature of our State may do; neither, I suppose, does my colleague.

Mr. PALMER. We can not tell, but I can say this: I do not like to state to the galleries how long ago I opposed State banks; and the present constitution is one that will not be changed as long as the present generation lasts. When it will be done after that time I can not tell. State banks are not possible in Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true at present, and I hope the policy will never be changed. My colleague says he is against State banks and has been always against them, and I have no doubt he states exactly what he means. The Representative from my district, Mr. SPRINGER, said he was against them, but I find he is chairman of a committee the majority of which is in favor of repealing the 10 per cent tax and the establishment of some sort of quondam State banks. So whatever may be the position of my colleague or any other individual member, the Democratic party in its convention declared in favor of the repeal of the 10 per cent tax, and the other House, if I may be allowed to refer to it, is taking steps in that direction.

Mr. PALMER. Will my colleague allow me to state another fact?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. He misstates the position of the Democratic party. In certain States the Democratic party favors State banks and the Democratic party in other States does not. The Democratic party in Illinois does not favor State banks. The Democratic party believes that the exercise of the power of taxation as a means of suppressing evils is wrong in principle. The Democratic party believes, if Congress has the power, which I think it has, to suppress State-bank issues, that power should be exercised directly and not indirectly, and that it is an abuse of the taxing power to employ it to suppress that which is intended to be prohibited; that it is dangerous as a precedent. While I am satisfied that the Democratic party opposed the taxation of the issues of State banks, in many of the States it is opposed to State banks.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely referred to this, first, because, as I understand it, it is in the Democratic platform at Chicago that that tax must be repealed; and, secondly, because in the next place a bill, I understand, is partly if not entirely agreed upon for that purpose. While there are doubtless individual Senators in that party who are against the re-establishment of State banks, I suppose as a matter of fact the majority of the party in the Senate on the other side of the aisle are in favor of a repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues. I may be mistaken in that, however, and I sincerely hope that I am.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator now be so kind——

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I am not intruding too much——

Mr. CULLOM. Not at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. To answer the question I put to him some time ago.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall be very happy to answer any question, if I can do so.

Mr. McPHERSON. The question which I asked the Senator was whether the 117,000 new laborers of whom he speaks could hope or expect to find employment among the industries of Chicago, let the tariff be what it may; and the Senator proceeds then to a generalization and evades the question. Will the Senator please answer that question now for the information of the people of Chicago, and for mine?

Mr. CULLOM. I should be very glad to give the Senator such an answer as he desires if I knew what the exact fact was; but he knows and I know that neither of us can tell exactly how many men could be employed of the 117,000 if all the mills and factories and business establishments there were in full operation. I do not know how many could be employed. I wish to suggest to the Senator that while, as I have said, there may be more there than could be employed with all the industries in operation, the men who are there hear the same story from everywhere else, because it is the same story in almost every manufacturing town, as I understand it. Therefore it is impossible for me to state exactly what the fact would be if the Democratic party had not succeeded last fall and all those mills were running as they used to be running under Republican rule.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly, it was the fear of the striking down of the present tariff that deprived labor of employment. If that be true, and the Senator will bear with me further, with a bill just prepared in another place which represents more completely the protective principle in tariff legislation (which is incidental protection) than any bill which has ever been made by any Congress in this country, a bill which will open a hundred factories where it will close up one—I want to know, then, in the presence of such a bill, how it is that the Senator pretends to say that it frightens the industries of the country?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is making a statement with which I take issue. I have no right to say yes or no absolutely; but I say to him that in my judgment the bill he refers to will, instead of giving protection, shut up almost every mill that is not already shut in this country. It is substantially a free-trade bill. And I want to say another thing, that while I have it not in my possession here, I have just received a communication from a gentleman engaged in a special line of manufacturing in which he says he knows nothing about the application of that proposed law to other business, but as to the business in which he is engaged it is a mere run and jump without any sense or reason in it in the tabulation of its rates; and that is what I believe as to most of the proposed changes to be found in the bill.

Now, then, let me read a little here about the laboring people. The Senator is anxious to know about where they are.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

This is from a newspaper, I do not vouch for it, but it is a statement, which I will read:

While WILLIAM L. WILSON regales the readers of the Sunday Press with solemn free-trade platitudes and dilates on the havoc which the scramble for spoils and the Sherman silver law have played with the country, the tariff bill which bears his name is bringing the industrial population of our great cities face to face with starvation. Careful estimates made by capable statisticians and published in yesterday's Sunday Press bring to light the appalling fact that the number out of work in New York is not less than 110,000.

Our people in Chicago can not go there.

In Chicago, over 100,000; in Philadelphia, not less than 90,000; in Boston, probably 40,000; in Cincinnati, over 15,000. Here we have in these five cities at the present moment no less than 360,000 unemployed. These are the great manufacturing cities of the country, and the proposed free-trade legislation will strike the severest blows at the industrial populations of such centers of industry. Including the ordinary increase since 1890, the number engaged in the manufacturing industries of these cities should to-day be as follows:

City.	Hands employed.	Wages paid.
New York	360,000	$250,000,000
Philadelphia	260,000	150,000,000
Chicago	225,000	130,000,000
Boston	160,000	60,000,000
Cincinnati	95,000	45,000,000
Total	1,040,000	635,000,000

The actual figures published by the census for one hundred and thirty-seven cities give the average amount of yearly earnings per head at $637, so the above estimate is undoubtedly within the mark for the five leading cities. Nearly one-third of the industrial population of these cities is out of work, which means an annual loss of wages of more than $200,000,000, or a sum of $16,600,000 per month. The unhappy condition existing in these cities extends, with hardly an exception, throughout the manufacturing regions of the country.

I see in the proceedings of the labor convention now in session in the city of Chicago the president of that convention, whatever it is called, says that there are not less than 3,000,000 laboring men out of employment to-day in the United States.

Mr. President, there never was such a condition of affairs existing in this country in all its history with reference to the laboring classes as exists at this very hour. What is the matter? The reason of it is that you are threatening the industries of this country so that nobody is willing to spend his money and open the doors of his factory or mill. That is one great reason.

Mr. MCPHERSON rose.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, I am nearly done, if the Senator will let me say ano her word or two.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not complain of the interruption at all. Mr. President, we are all American citizens, free to approve and free to criticise. We watch closely every act of our public servants, and we feel proud of our country and its institutions. We do not want them disturbed. We revere the country and the flag. Not a man or woman but feels proud of the honor of giving due allegiance to the flag of our country, and any sacrilege done to that glorious symbol will never be condoned.

Mr. President, I beg pardon for having occupied so long the time of the Senate.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH HAWAII.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I should like——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour not having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday. By consent the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] occupied a portion of the morning hour in addressing the Senate upon the subject-matter discussed by him.

Mr. MANDERSON. My recollection is that at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] those resolutions went over until to-morrow morning and they will then come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two Senators offering the resolutions consented that they should be withheld at the particular time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I then ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be passed over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and the resolutions will go ovor until to-morrow morning.

Mr. FRYE. To which resolution does the Chair refer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]. The Senator from Nevada is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion was made to me from the other side of the Chamber this morning that it might be well to let the resolution submitted by me go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It calls for some matter not called for in the resolution which has heretofore passed the Senate, but it is quite possible that the answer to the resolution which has passed the Senate will bring the answer to this resolution. So I said to the Senator who made the suggestion to me that I should not object to the resolution going to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The matter may, however, go over until to-morrow and then be disposed of as we shall agree.

Mr. CALL. I only wish to say that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] was not in the Chamber this morning when consent was given that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] should occupy the morning hour. I think it was understood that the Sentor from Delaware desired to submit some remarks.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware is the Senator to whom I referred and with whom I had the conversation. Let the matter stand until he comes in then, Mr. President.

Mr. FRYE. Is there objection to the resolution going over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a little while to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is no objection to both resolutions going over until to-morrow morning, holding their right of then being presented to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I should object simply for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Delaware to be heard to-day if he desired. I do not, however, see him in the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. He will be here to-morrow morning undoubtedly.

M. CALL. Very well. I have no more to say.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor on the bill (S. 412) to repeal Title XXVI of the Revised Statutes of the United States, known as the Federal election law.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Federal election law does not involve the question of honest elections, but does involve in what jurisdiction the question of honest elections shall be determined, whether by the States or the General Government. Inasmuch as the power to legislate with regard to the election of members of the House of Representatives is possessed both by the State and the General Government, it is a question of expediency and good government where that power should be exercised. It is manifest that the power, if exercised by the General Government, should never be exercised to interfere with the election of State officers, but primarily by the Constitution it was intended that the States should regulate all elections. The language of the Constitution is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

By an examination of the debates in the convention for the formation of the Constitution, it will be observed that so far as the convention was concerned, the object of the latter clause was a specific object. It was suggested that the States might not pass any laws providing for the election of either Senators or members of the lower House, and that the Union might thus be dissolved by mere negation, by the failure to act; and I believe some cases were cited where such failures had occurred during the existence of the Continental Congress. To place it in the power of the General Government to preserve its own existence this clause was inserted. The primary authority was in the States. It was recognized by the Constitution throughout that the States should have full and ample control of their local elections, and this clause was placed in the Constitution solely for the purpose of meeting the contingency of nonaction, and for no other purpose.

No case exists in the United States where a State has not provided ample laws for the election of Members of the House of Representatives and Senators, particularly the election of members of the other House. The States have ample laws for that purpose.

The Federal election law relates solely to the election of Members of the House of Representatives, but does not apply to the election of Senators. It is provided that the qualifications of voters to elect Members of the House of Representatives shall be the same as those in the States for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The whole theory of the Constitution is that the State shall regulate.

The question arises, Does any emergency exist calling for Congressional interference? There certainly does not such an emergency exist as was contemplated in the Constitution, because all the States have election laws on their statute books.

It is said, however, that there are frauds in the States, and therefore Congress ought to interfere to secure pure elections. I am not satisfied that our elections would be improved by Congressional interference. It has a tendency to remove from the people of the States that individual responsibility which the conducting of local elections involves. There undoubtedly have been frauds in every State and irregularities in elections, and there will continue to be irregularities in elections in the future; but the public sentiment of the people in every State is against unfair dealing at the polls. The people desire honest elections, and they must be trusted to procure them. If they can not be trusted, our Government is at an end. The foundation of republican government is local elections, local self-government. That is the foundation of free institutions.

I know that those high in power have always supposed they could govern better than the people; and here comes in the very distinction between monarchy and republicanism. In a republican form of government the theory is that the people can be trusted; in a monarchical form of government the theory is that the people are incapable of governing themselves. We are trying the experiment, and have been more successful than any other people thus far in carrying out government and trusting to the people in their local capacity to govern themselves. If we take that responsibility from them which justly belongs to them in a republican government there is danger of their depending upon the General Government and trusting to it to accomplish results which they alone can accomplish in a republican form of government.

I think the danger to this country comes from Federal power and Federal usurpation and not from local self-government. The bad condition of things which now exists in this country can be traced to the unjust exercise of Federal power as plainly as anything which exists in nature. For twenty years the people have demanded financial reform and protested against the destruction of one of the precious metals and the abandonment of the automatic theory of regulating the quantity of money by the quantity of the two metals.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Not right here. I do not wish to be broken into at this point.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). The Senator from Nevada declines to yield.

Mr. STEWART. I decline to yield until I get through with this branch of the subject.

During all this time the Federal power has been used to thwart the will of the people and prevent the restoration of silver. The Federal veto and the Federal patronage have been the lion in the path, and the Federal patronage and the Federal veto have finally launched this country upon the single gold standard and sent misery and want to the homes of the great mass of the people. No other substantial reason can be given for want and starvation in this land of plenty, after twenty-five years of peace and abundant harvests, but a vicious monetary system enforced upon this country by Federal power, by the Executive.

The members of Congress are sufficiently dependent upon the Executive for their reëlection; the Federal patronage is regarded as a necessity to the successful politician; and whatever his pledges may have been to his constituents, however strong his conviction of right may be, when he comes to Washington he finds himself confronted with the alternative to forego all the rewards of his party or submit to Federal dictation. You place in that same Executive another great power when you give him control of local elections. You say it is done by the judges, the marshals, and the supervisors, but the marshals who form the greatest number of these officials are immediately under the Federal Executive; the judges are appointed by the Chief Executive, and become, I am sorry to say, as a rule strongly tinctured with a sense of the superiority of the Federal over the State governments as soon as they receive their commissions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STEWART. I do not like to be interrupted, but I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Nevada, inasmuch as he took a distinguished part in the enactment of the Federal election law, what has led him to change his mind? I wanted to ask him that before he came to the silver question, and that is why I interrupted him at the time I did.

Mr. STEWART. The original Federal election law was placed upon a bill of which I had charge, and I voted for it. Since that time I have watched its operation. It undoubtedly has prevented some fraud, as any law against frauds might do. It may have worked well in certain instances, but I have observed its operation and have observed the operations of the Government for the last twenty-two years since I voted for the law, and am thoroughly convinced that it was a mistake even then, although its enactment was at the close of the war, when the normal condition of the country had not been fully restored. I believe it was a mistake even then, and I am more and more satisfied that Federal interference in local elections is vicious in practice, vicious in principle, and vicious in results. I have arrived at this conclusion by observing the operations of this law, by observing the dependence of States upon the Federal Government to obtain fair elections, and by observing the divided responsibility which it has created.

We have in the last two or three years since the proposed Federal election bill was defeated, ample evidence to show that the people can be trusted. Look at the South. We hear now of frauds in Virginia and Alabama. The people come against each other there face to face. Does anybody doubt that the frauds will be rectified? This contest in the South is no longer between parties; it is not between the Republican party and the Democratic party; it is not a contest to place the colored man in power over the white man, but it is a contest for good government, in which all the whites are interested, and they will again, as they have in the past, secure a pure ballot, and if there are frauds they will expose them.

The Democratic papers of Virginia are criticising the late elections with the greatest severity, whether justly or unjustly I do not know. I am speaking of the fact that the newspapers have taken hold of the complaints which the people make, and that old Virginia will have just and equitable laws to protect the right of suffrage in the near future, as she had in the distant past, I have no doubt. The same will be true in every Southern State, and will be true in Illinois. That great State is abundantly able, without the assistance of the Federal Government, to maintain the law. So is the State of New York. There is complaint in all large cities, it is true. It is a difficult problem, but what jurisdiction is best to deal with it?

The great people of the State of New York, with their interests interwoven in every election, with the local knowledge of frauds, if frauds are committed, with ample power physically, morally, and intellectually, are able to control the question. Does anybody believe that New York will submit to fraudulent elections to the injury of the Republic? If these great States can not protect the ballot box, the Government of the United States is certainly powerless to do so. Does anybody suppose that officers who are strangers to the vicinage, who are not responsible to their neighbors, who are appointed by Federal authority, will be purer and fairer than those who are held accountable in the locality where they live? I believe that it was never the intention of the Government of the United States to interfere in any local election whatever, and that this power when given was given for a specific purpose, to be used in a certain contingency, to wit, when a State refused or neglected to provide for the election of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

If you add to the executive influence another great power—the control of elections—a member of Congress will come here entirely dependent upon the Executive; and if the Executive does not happen to possess all the wisdom or all the patriotism in the country, if he has not a monopoly of everything good, if he is not something more than human, he will wield the power you place in his hands. It is human nature that he should do so. If he wield the veto power and the patronage, and also the control of the Federal elections, what voice can the people have in these Halls?

I am opposed to interfering in any way with local self-government. The more I study the necessity of maintaining it, the more I see that republican government rests alone upon the right of the people to regulate their own local affairs, to regulate their own elections, and without that right a republic can not exist except in name.

I shall not stop here to discuss this fraud or that fraud. I say that there can be no fraud in any State sufficiently important to affect its prosperity without arousing the indignation of the best people of that State. The newspapers will inevitably call attention to it; good men will condemn it; and when you take the Federal power away and leave the people free, I have absolute confidence in their love of right, their love of fair play, their love of a republican government, which depends upon pure elections.

We must trust them. We cannot assume that we in the General Government are better than the States, because we are composed of representatives of the States, and those whom the people themselves send without Federal interference will be best qualified to represent the will of the people; and it is the will of the people which ought to govern and which must govern if the Republic is to be maintained, not the will of the Chief Executive, not the will of those who manipulate elections, but the will of the people. How can that will be best expressed? Through the representatives of the General Government or by the people themselves in their own local forum, where the witnesses are known and where the great mass of the people have cognizance of the facts?

This Constitution was wise; it left the subject with the States; and because it provided for a certain contingency, in which it would be proper for the General Government to interfere, it was by no means intended that the General Government should usurp the power intended to remain in the States.

The Senator from Illinois has discussed the financial question in connection with the repeal of the Federal election law, and has assumed that alleged frauds in local elections in certain States have produced the universal distress which now exists. Under these circumstances it is proper for me to call attention to the real cause of the want and misery which prevail throughout the land. In order to do that, I will call attention to the real source of all the trouble—vicious financial legislation—the result of cunning on the one side and ignorance on the other.

The word "value" is the stumbling block in monetary science. The advocates of the gold standard contend that "value" is intrinsic and consists of the qualities of a thing which render it useful. The economists who assert that, other things being equal, the quantity of money in circulation determines the purchasing power of each dollar or other unit of money, define the term "value," when used in monetary science, to be the comparative worth of property exchanged as estimated by buyer and seller in the consummation of a contract of purchase and sale.

INTRINSIC VALUE THEORY.

If "value" is intrinsic and adheres in money, the quality of the material of which money is made is all that need be considered. The intrinsic quality of gold is always the same and its value, if intrinsic, must be the same now as it was in the beginning and as it will be to the end of time.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEWART. I would prefer not to be interrupted now.

Mr. McPHERSON. I merely wanted to know whether the Senator was discussing the value of money in elections?

Mr. STEWART. The discussion on the Federal election law has taken a wide range. It has been assumed that the financial depression in the country was in some way connected with this election law, and I am showing how the financial question is connected with the financial embarrassments which have brought the country on the brink of ruin.

The entire argument of the "intrinsic value" school may be stated as follows: The value of gold is the intrinsic quality of gold itself. The quality of gold can never change, therefore the "value" of gold is always the same. If we admit the premises, the conclusion is inevitable.

If all the rocks could be converted into gold, an ounce of gold would be worth just as much as it now is. Under this theory gold is the true and unchangeable measure of value of all other things. A gold dollar would buy no more if there was only one gold dollar in existence than if there were ten thousand millions of such dollars, because the intrinsic quality of gold (which determines its value) would be the same whether the quantity were great or small.

The legislation of the United States and Europe for the last twenty years has been on the intrinsic-value theory. Silver was demonetized and more than one-half of the metallic money of the world rejected on the theory that quality alone determines the "value" of money. If this theory be correct, why sell bonds and buy gold? Is not the quality of gold we now have the same as the quality of the gold which it is proposed to buy? Is not the proposal to buy more gold an admission that quantity is an element in the value of money? How can such an admission be harmonized with the policy of the legislation of the extra session and the mandates of the London and New York syndicate?

The goal of sound money (according to the authority of the President and his advisers) has been reached, and every gold dollar is as good as every other gold dollar of the same weight and fineness. No poor laboring man can now be defrauded because his gold dollar is not just as good as the gold dollar of his rich neighbor. The demand for good money, so urgently pressed by the gold kings in behalf of labor, has been answered by appropriate legislation.

Why should the laboring man complain? Have not the gold press, the Executive, the ex-Executive, and all the gold advocates on both sides of the Atlantic yielded to the demand of labor for good money? Why should not the gold advocates be astonished at the dissatisfaction of the starving millions of the unemployed? What right have the masses to complain of starvation while the money in the banks is dear gold? Why should the advocates of sound money tolerate legislation to increase the supply of money in response to the false and exploded idea that if there were more money more people might get some of it?

An increase of the quantity of money would not improve its quality, but it might enhance the danger of its distribution among the masses.

Why should the gold advocates be annoyed after they have spent so much money and time to secure legislation to make money good and dear? Why should not every good citizen be thankful because no money except good money exists in the coffers of the rich? What a debt of gratitude (in addition to other debts) the wealth producers of this country owe to the money-changers of London and New York for removing all money out of the reach of all producers to prevent loss by shrinkage of the value of money in their pockets! What a consolation it must be to all true patriots to know that there is now no money but good money, and that all good money is in the safe keeping of the gold combine, where the touch of the common herd can not contaminate, defile, nor mar its shining beauty!

The "intrinsic value" theory, if true, is a full justification for the demonetization of silver; for if quantity has nothing to do with the value of money there was no use for the four thousand millions silver coin in the world.

Is this bill reported from the Finance Committee to increase national-bank circulation consistent with the intrinsic value theory? Will the intrinsic value of national-bank notes be any greater than that of gold? What excuse can be given for putting out more national-bank circulation if quality, without regard to quantity, is the only requisite of good money?

The "intrinsic quality" of money has not been impaired by the rejection of silver. Why should the money function of silver be restored? Why mine more gold? New gold will not improve the quality of the gold we have. Why object to the absorption of gold in the arts if the intrinsic value of what remains will not be affected by a reduction in quantity?

THE QUANTITATIVE THEORY.

The school of economists who believe that the quantity of money in circulation, other things being equal, regulates the value of dollars or other units of account, learn from the street corners that the "value" of a thing is what it will fetch. Inasmuch as there must be a buyer and a seller and a contract of purchase and sale before an article can fetch anything, the definition already given fits the case. I repeat, value is the comparative worth of property exchanged, estimated by buyer and seller in the consummation of a contract of purchase and sale.

"Value" neither adheres in nor pertains to any one thing. It is a comparison of the desirability of two or more things. Such comparison is an operation of the mental faculties of the buyer and seller resulting in an exchange of property for property, no matter what the property exchanged is. It may be money, services, or commodities, but an estimation of the relative worth of the things exchanged must be made before the contract is consummated. Every actual transaction forms some basis or guide for estimates of what would probably be the exchangeable value for other articles or services in a contract of barter or in the selling price of commodities in money.

Price is a synonym for "value," and commercial price is also the comparative worth of property exchanged as estimated by buyer and seller in the consummation of a contract of purchase and sale. The difference between "price" and "value" does not arise from any essential difference in the meaning of the terms, but from a difference in their application. "Value" is applied to money and "price" to the exchangeable worth of commodities into money.

There are two conditions precedent to either "price" or "value." There must be a demand and a limitation of quantity. If there is no demand there can be neither commercial value nor market price. If the quantity is unlimited, like the air we breathe, and the thing desired can be obtained in unlimited quantities, without money and without price, then there can be no comparative worth of property exchanged to be estimated by buyer and seller in the consummation of a contract. But when demand and limitation of quantity exist, the value or price is determined by the supply and demand.

All property for sale is a demand for money. The demand for money is, therefore, equal to the demand for all other things, and is always a maximum demand. The aggregate of property for sale is not only the total demand for money, but it is also the supply of property, and all the money in circulation is both the demand for property and the supply of money. A reduction of the volume of circulation diminishes the supply of money and (the demand remaining the same) enhances the value of each dollar or unit of money. An addition to the circulation increases the supply of money and (the demand remaining the same) reduces the value of each dollar or unit of money. Conversely, a reduction of the amount of property for sale (the volume of money remaining stationary) increases the general price of property. An increase in the property for sale (the volume of money remaining the same) reduces general prices.

The demand for everything except money is limited. The demand may be greater or less than the supply. If the demand be greater than the supply, the price of the commodity will rise above the general level of prices; if less than the supply, the price of the article will fall below that level.

A variety of causes affect the relative price of commodities, and also their relative value in money. But fluctuations in the demand and supply of particular articles do not affect the aggregate demand for all property for sale or the aggregate supply of the money in circulation, because, as we have already seen, the property for sale and the money in circulation are reciprocally the demand and supply of each other. When the aggregate of all the property for sale and the volume of money are stationary, the general level of prices will also be stationary.

If the property for sale increases in quantity and the volume of money remains the same, general prices will fall. If the aggregate of property is stationary and the volume of money is increased, general prices will rise. If the increase in quantity of property for sale and the increase in the volume of money are equal, general prices will remain stationary and stability in values will be maintained, which is the end and aim of monetary science. We have already seen that the value in the aggregate of money in circulation is measured by the aggregate of property for sale.

The property for sale remaining stationary, the value of money in circulation will be the same whether the volume of circulation be large or small. It makes no difference what number of dollars or units may be required to make up the volume of money in circulation, the value in the aggregate will be the same so long as the total amount of property offered in exchange is neither increased nor diminished. What part of such aggregate demand one dollar will be depends upon the number of dollars into which the circulation is divided. Hence, the value of each dollar depends upon the number of dollars in circulation. Any increase or decrease in the property for sale (the volume of money remaining the same) will increase or decrease the value of each dollar or unit of money.

Hence, the increase of property for sale and the decrease in the volume of money produced by the demonetization of silver are the cause of the decline of general prices about 50 per cent in the last twenty years.

When money is increasing in value and prices are falling, everybody seeks investment in money or bonds, or other credits which are money features. When prices are rising everybody seeks the acquisition of or investment in property. In other words, when money is rising and property falling, everybody desires to go long on money and short on property. When prices are rising and the value of money falling, everybody desires to go long on property and short on money. Individuals can not create money, and can only go long on money by the acquisition of money or bonds and credits, which are money features. Individuals can acquire property both by labor and by investments. No wealth can be produced by going long on money. All wealth is produced by going long on property by the use of labor.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, this is a very important discussion that is going on. I think there ought to be a quorum present.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; I do not want a quorum. Senators would know the cause of all the trouble outside if they were here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of a quorum being raised, it becomes the duty of the Chair to direct the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. I regret it very much. I do not want Senators to be compelled to come in.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. The value of money depends, as we have already seen, upon the volume in circulation, which is now fixed, as we shall hereafter see, by legislation. If legislation would supply a sufficient volume of money to take away the profit of going long on money, and would thereby encourage the accumulation of property, every willing hand would find employment and wealth and prosperity would increase.

I am aware of the fact that habits of thought, education, and prejudice attach much importance to the precious metals without examining what, if any, necessary functions they perform. The conversion of either metal into money withdraws it from use as a commodity. It can not be employed as money and at the same time used as a commodity. The use of it as money deprives it of use as a commodity, and the use of it as a commodity deprives it of its money function.

The use of gold and silver in the arts does not increase their utility as money. On the contrary, their absorption for non-monetary purposes decreases the supply of money metal, produces contraction, and interferes with the equity of contracts and the stability of general prices. The growing demand for gold in the arts already absorbs about all of the annual output from the mines and threatens serious inroads upon the stock of gold on hand. If gold could be used for no other purpose but coinage into money, the evils of the gold standard would be greatly mitigated.

The only important function which either of the precious metals performs, and which could not be performed equally well by many other commodities, especially paper, is limitation of quantity. Rude nature limited the quantity of metallic money by the precious metals for thousands of years and never during all that time permitted man to obtain too much of either gold or silver, or of both. The accumulations of all the ages up to 1873 amounted to only about $7,000,000,000 of gold and silver coin distributed among all the nations of the earth. But this accumulation was sufficiently large to render the output of the mines in any one year a very small percentage of the whole and to prevent violent fluctuations.

The mines in 1873 were and still are reasonably productive, but not sufficiently so to furnish a supply of money which would more than keep pace with the increase of population. If all the gold and all the silver produced from the mines had been coined during the last twenty years, the percentage of increase of metallic money would not have been equal to the growth of population. The gold from California and Australia between 1848 and 1873 about doubled the metallic money of the world; but the increase of general prices was only about 18 per cent. After supplying the arts the total output of gold and silver available for coinage since silver was demonetized has not exceeded 30 per cent of the coin of the two metals which was on hand in 1873, which is a less per cent than the growth of population.

If both metals had been freely coined, there would have been no expansion of the volume of money as compared with population; there would probably have been some contraction. If the demonetization of silver is consummated, gold must also be demonetized to prevent inevitable disaster. The function of limiting and regulating the volume of standard money which the two metals performed can not be performed by one. The limitation, when both were used, was too narrow and contracted; stagnation, and often barbarism, followed a failure of the output of the mines.

The rejection of silver as a money metal is an abandonment of the automatic theory by which the volume of money was regulated by the quantity of the two metals. The demonetization of one metal by legislation proves that there is nothing sacred either in gold or silver, or in the automatic theory itself. The rejection of silver as a money metal will lead to the disuse of both much sooner than the demonetization of gold would have done; because silver is the more plentiful metal, with a more regular and permanent supply from the mines, and because a large amount of the output of gold (probably one-third) is obtained from silver mines, and also because the arts now consume nearly if not all of the annual output of gold. The limitation of the volume of standard money of the world to gold alone must so enhance the value of gold and reduce the price of property and wages as to produce such disaster as must end either in revolution or financial slavery of the masses.

Since the function of regulating the volume of money by the aggregate of the two metals (which seemed so important) has been destroyed by legislation, it is essential to inquire if both gold and silver may not be discarded as money? The argument was that legislation could not be trusted to regulate the volume of money, but rude nature might safely dole out gold and silver in proper quantities to furnish the requisite supply of money of ultimate payment. The plan of adopting the accumulations of the precious metals, with their annual additions from the output of the mine, has been abandoned.

The legislation rejecting one of the metals, issuing paper money, and establishing national banks is an assumption of absolute control by Congress over the quantity and quality of the circulating medium. Every question relating to money is now a subject of legislation.

We have seen that the volume of circulation as compared with the aggregate of property for sale is the paramount question for consideration. Why may not some limitation be ascertained and adopted which will preserve the equity of time contracts and maintain stability of general prices? Why may not some system be devised, based on principle, which shall control legislation on the most important subject which affects the human race? Why should the money changers be allowed to control, for selfish purposes, the finances of the civilized world, and why should legislators grope in the dark and pass tentative and experimental laws, if a system can be devised which will maintain equity between debtor and creditor and secure general prosperity?

Suppose the United States should stamp upon properly engraved and prepared paper the words "one dollar" and make it the unit of account and a legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private, and should also stamp upon other like pieces of paper words and figures which should be multiples of such dollar of such denominations as might be required, and make all such pieces of paper so prepared and stamped a full legal tender in payment of debts and redeemable in taxes and in all the property for sale in the United States. Would not such dollars be good money? Suppose a hundred millions of such legal-tender money was prepared and covered into the Treasury to meet the present deficiency and avoid an increase of taxation, would not that relieve the present situation and have a tendency to revive business?

Suppose further, that enough of such legal-tender money should be prepared to take the place of every other kind of money, whether paper or gold or silver, which is now in circulation, and that when paper money now outstanding is received in the Treasury it should be destroyed and such legal-tender money issued in lieu thereof, and that when either gold or silver coin should be paid into the Treasury it should be melted up and sold as bullion and such legal tender-money issued in its place.

Suppose further, that such a process should be continued until all the present circulation of the United States should be retired and one kind of money redeemable in debts, taxes, and all exchangeable property should be substituted for it.

Suppose further that a sum of new money equal to 3 per cent of the volume of money existing on the 1st day of July in each year should be issued annually and covered into the Treasury in lieu of taxes, so as to increase the circulation to keep pace with the increase of population; and suppose further that a board of statisticians should be organized to investigate prices and report from time to time whether such increase of 3 per cent per annum was sufficient to maintain stability of prices; and if not sufficient, suppose more legal-tender money should be covered into the Treasury and more taxation relieved until stability of prices, according to such statistical investigations, should be maintained, would not the United States have a good financial system? If not, why not?

Why would not such money be as good as paper redeemable in gold with the constant fear of want of gold for redemption?

Would not money clothed with the exclusive power of legal tender and the exclusive right of redemption in all debts, taxes, and property in the United States be good money in any part of the world and convertible without loss, except the price of exchange, into the money of any foreign country? Why would not the only money which would pay debts and taxes and buy property in the richest country in the world, buy anything that might be produced in the United States or any other country? Whatever objections might be made to such a financial system, would it not be better than the gold standard, which means perpetual contraction, falling prices, stagnation, hard times, and misery?

If silver can not be remonetized, and the former system of regulating the volume of circulation automatically by the quantity of gold and silver attainable restored, the interests of the human race require the speedy demonetization of gold and the substitution of some other kind of money of sufficient volume to maintain the equity of contracts, supply the necessities of the people for money, and prevent inevitable disaster.

Now, Mr. President, I admit that this was a digression from the election bill; but I think what I have said is quite pertinent when two Senators stand on the floor, one on one side and the other on the other, and claim that the universal ruin that is abroad in the land resulted from the election of A or B or from some trifling irregularity in some local election. When this great question is treated with such trifling nonsense as we have heard it is time we commenced to investigate the money and see what really is the matter. The country is suffering from the gold standard. There is no money to do business with, and what there is is congested in the money centers. No man dare use it. It was formerly invested in bonds, and money futures were formerly sought; but the foundation of so many of those money futures has been removed by bankruptcies of railroads and other corporations that men fear to invest even in bonds.

The example of the ruin of the mass of business by contraction, by falling prices, deters others from entering into enterprises; and here you have $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 of idle money that nobody dares use, and the men who have it will not let it go for any legitimate purpose. They demand United States bonds or something of that kind before they will let it go. A man who has any property dare not borrow money to put in enterprises for fear of losing all he has. The man who has money dare not risk it for fear of a further fall in prices.

That is the condition. It is contraction all the time. Prices do not fall in an incline plane, because everybody having property holds on to it to the last moment until the crash comes and then it drops below where the volume of money would maintain it. Prices fall, property is sacrificed, and the country stands appalled at the ruin that has taken place, and that ruin is a warning to others to keep out of business, and nothing is done.

In a few months there will be a seeming prosperity again when the money gets out, but the iron hand of contraction will check enterprises again and again. The history of the last twenty years is a history of slight prosperity and spasms of bankruptcy, and it will so continue as long as we continue to adhere to the gold standard, and falling prices which must follow that standard as certainly as night follows day.

When this appalling condition has been produced by events as logical and certain as mathematics we hear it attributed to a threat to repeal an election law. We hear hard times attributed to the fact that we do not put more power in the Executive. How has he used the power he has had? Let the history of the last twenty years bear testimony. For twenty years, if the majority had been untrammeled in the two Houses, there has been no time when they would not have given relief to the people, but they had confronting them the threat of an Executive veto; they had confronting them a threat to take away the Federal patronage and destroy them at home: and now they say that things would be benefited by placing before them another threat to control local elections and deny to the States the right to send their representatives here.

Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong the discussion at this time. The President of the United States, in his message to the extra session, promised us a comprehensive financial policy. He now tells us that we must wait for a policy until we see how the gold standard will work; that we shall not be students in history; that we shall abandon our mathematics and let the country suffer, and fill your streets with tramps and your homes with hunger while we have an opportunity to study the object lesson.

Have we not a sufficient object lesson? Unfortunately while he tells us that he has not disclosed the entire sum and substance and full extent of the gold-standard policy, he does not state the case truthfully. At the extra session he demanded and secured the repeal of the only law that recognized silver bullion as a money metal and adopted the gold standard. He now recommends the issuance of bonds, to borrow money to redeem the ten or eleven hundred million dollars of silver and paper in circulation. That is the gold policy. I so stated when the extra session met. They have no policy but the gold standard and further taxation, falling prices, bonds to be used by the national banks, bonds for gilt-edged investments, bonds for money futures to enable those who want to go long on money to have a safe place to put their money, bonds for those who control the money of the world, taxation, falling prices, starvation, and misery for the masses.

That is the policy which is disclosed and set forth, and it is the full extent of the policy of the gold men. They have nothing else to offer. They have made no other suggestion but taxation, falling prices, and hard times, in or out of Congress, but the utter destruction of silver as money, the limitation of the money to gold, and promises to pay gold. Believing that the United States can grind the people enough to comply with almost any promise, they proposed this policy and no other: and here we have misery abroad in the land resulting from a vicious financial system, and no man who speaks by authority for the Administration dare give us a suggestion of any relief but gold and bonds.

Whether it has been the case with the President or not, the people have had sufficient of this object lesson, and his command to them to delay and see what the gold men will work out of it is cold comfort in these cold nights to men who have nowhere to lay their heads and have not food to eat.

I shall at a future day take occasion to make some further remarks on the gloomy aspect foretold in the President's message. The only hope is further misery, further hard times, further falling prices; and that is a sad spectacle to those who have got to meet the coming hard winter.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FISH COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations submitted by the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMEN SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the Freedmen Savings and Trust Company, submitting report for the year ending December 2, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PYTHIAN CONCLAVE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate joint resolution (S. R. 44) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the Monument grounds and reservations and public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution will, without objection, be indefinitely postponed, the House having passed a similar resolution, in which the Senate has concurred.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bills, which were severally read a first and second time and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 75) for the relief of Thomas Guinean—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 171) granting to the State of North Dakota certain lands heretofore set apart as a wood reservation for Fort Totten military reservation for the use of the militia of North Dakota and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 333) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 463) to reimburse the State of Nebraska the expenses incurred by that State in repelling a threatened invasion and raid by the Sioux in 1890 and 1891—to the Committee on Claims. and

A bill (S. 882) granting a pension to Frances Corse, widow of Gen. John M. Corse—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the press dispatches sent forth on Friday last announcing the individual vote upon the bankruptcy bill inadvertently did me injustice by omitting my name, and thereby creating the impression that I had dodged the vote upon that measure.

The truth is, I was not only in my seat during the debate on that measure, but I voted every time in Committee of the Whole, and also on the roll call in the House; and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Saturday bears me out in that by recording my name in the negative on the proposition to kill the bill by striking out its enacting clause. I have always been an advocate of a just bill, such as would protect the honest debtor and creditor alike, a measure providing for a uniform and national system of bankruptcy, and the purpose of my remarks is, I desire it understood that I voted in accordance with those convictions.

POSTAL REVENUE.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Commission to inquire into the status of the Laws Regulating the Departments to present a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4310) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes, requiring deposit of receipts with the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. The Clerk will please read the report of the Commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the bill (H. R.

4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend that it do pass, with the title amended so as to read as follows:

"A bill to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department."

Section 407 of the Revised Statues now requires that the certificates of deposits by postmasters shall be sent by the depositories, through the office making the deposit, to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and from that office to the Auditor.

The accompanying bill changes the law so as to require the certificate to be sent directly to the Auditor's Office, obviating the delay now experienced, which is to no purpose, since the work in the Third Assistant's office is that of merely entering the amount of the certificates of deposit in books arranged by quarters to accord with the alphabetical arrangement of offices making deposits, but which are neither balanced, proved, nor checked against anything else, and which necessarily afford an imperfect guide to the status of any account, being, as will be seen, credits for money only, and does not include credits from other sources or any of the debits.

The certificates are needed to make a complete and final check by the Auditor; and to avoid delay in the adjustment of postal accounts should go direct to that office.

The proposed change will facilitate the settlement of postmasters' accounts by at least one month.

ALEXANDER M. DOCKERY,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
NELSON DINGLEY, JR.,
Members on the part of the House of Representatives.
F. M. COCKRELL,
JAMES K. JONES,
S. M. CULLOM,
Members on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is recommended by the Postmaster-General, and I will ask the Clerk to read his letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman Joint Commission of Congress, etc., Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have examined the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require certificates of deposits by postmasters to be sent direct to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, and desire to say that its passage will greatly facilitate the settlement of accounts of postmasters, and I therefore earnestly recommend its passage by Congress.

Very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the only change that this bill makes in the statutes is to require the postmasters to send certificates of deposits directly to the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, in charge of the postal affairs, instead of to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General; and the Commission have ascertained that this will greatly expedite the settlement of postmasters' accounts. The Postmaster-General also recommends it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes requiring deposit of receipts with the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 407 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

SEC. 407. The postal revenues and all debts due the Post-Office Department shall, when collected, be paid into the Treasury of the United States under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and the Treasurer, Assistant Treasurer, or designated depository receiving such payment shall give the depositor a duplicate receipt therefor, to be retained by him in his office as a voucher, and shall forward the original to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, to be placed to the credit of the depositor in audit of his accounts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the title will be amended in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission.

There was no objection, and it was ordered.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Upon request of Mr. CUMMINGS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to the Committee on Naval Affairs to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. GOLDZIER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence, for two weeks, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print in the RECORD remarks upon House bill 384.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Committee on Commerce to the bill (H. R. 3389) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey, having met, after full and free conference, have failed to agree.

FRANKLIN BARTLETT,
LOREN FLETCHER,
Conferees on the part of the House.
G. G. VEST,
A. P. GORMAN,
WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GEARY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GEARY, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. FLETCHER.

BANKRUPTCY.

The committees being called for reports,

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported with amendments a bill (H. R. 4609) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported with amendments a bill (H. R. 1-92) to limit the jurisdiction of district and circuit courts of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The call of committees for reports was completed.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for consideration begins at twenty-six minutes past 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Territories.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the concurrent resolution in relation to the personnel of the Navy.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there are constantly before Congress numerous bills dealing with the question of rank and pay in the Navy, and other matters concerning the personnel of the same; and

Whereas the present laws relating to this subject are in many instances imperfect, inconsistent, unjust, and the result of piecemeal legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed respectively by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to fully investigate and consider the entire subject of the rank, pay, and all other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy; to have power to send for persons and papers, sit during the recess, if any, and during the sitting of both Houses, and to report at any time after it convenes as may be convenient what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises; any bill so reported by them shall simplify, codify, and revise existing laws relating to the personnel of the Navy so far as may be found possible. And said joint committee is hereby authorized to employ a clerk at $6 per day and a messenger at $3 per day while employed, and any expenses incurred by said commission in performing the duties herein required shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know what is the status of the amendment that was offered by me and, I believe, accepted by the Committee on Naval Affairs in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Committee of the Whole agreed to an amendment. Whenever the resolution is reported to the House that amendment will be reported with it.

Mr. SAYERS. The amendment has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. By the committee, but not by the House. The concurrent resolution is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Committee on Naval Affairs has accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] striking out the provision for the employment of a stenographer and a messenger, I wish to ask whether it would not be in order to consider this resolution in the House instead of going into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has not been reported by the committee to the House.

Mr. MEYER. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of this concurrent resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MEYER. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 45, noes 3.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. MEYER, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. KILGORE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 177, noes 1; so the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole to consider the concurrent resolution, which will now be read.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the last sentence of the resolution, as follows:

"And said joint committee is hereby authorized to employ a clerk at $6 per day and a messenger at $3 per day while employed, and any expenses incurred by said commission in performing the duties herein required shall be defrayed equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which the Clerk has just read was agreed to by the Committee of the Whole at a former sitting, and it will be so reported to the House.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to consume time during this morning hour in making any extended remarks. There appears to be a mistaken impression on the part of members of the House as to the purpose and scope of this resolution. During the last session of Congress the gentleman who is at present Secretary of the Navy introduced in this House a resolution of similar character to this; and it only failed of passage because of lack of time. In his recent report the Secretary of the Navy alludes again to this subject in language which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PERSONNEL.

I can not too strongly recommend Congressional action in reference to the personnel of the line of the Navy. Its present condition is too serious to be neglected any longer, and unless remedies are adopted looking to some system of promotion which will produce a regular flow from the bottom to the top of the list, the consequences not only to the service, but also to the Government will soon be nothing less than alarming.

The object of any scheme of promotion in the Navy should be to produce efficient commanding officers, the accomplishment of which necessitates that officers of the line be made to bear the responsibilities of actual command by or before the time they have reached the prime of life, while they are still young enough to accommodate themselves to the demands upon intellect and energy which are made by the assumption of control of a modern man-of-war.

A clear understanding of the necessity for immediate action in this matter can only be gained by a statement of the principal causes heretofore existing which have led to the present stagnation in promotion, which statement will also show that neither the evils themselves nor the necessity for removing them are open to dispute. The principal causes which have led to the present condition of affairs are, briefly stated, as follows:

First. In 1855 Congress authorized a scrutiny of the active list which resulted in the removal of a large number of officers, the vacancies thus created being filled from the passed-midshipmen of the Navy. The immediate effect of this was the reduction of the number of officers below the grade of lieutenant from 258 in 1854 to 73 in 1857. This number had only increased to 91 when the outbreak of the civil war occurred, an event which caused a great number of resignations from all grades of the Navy, creating at once many vacancies all through the line, to fill which there existed only the small number of junior officers mentioned above. The resulting embarrassment of the Department for officers in the junior grades forced the Government to supply its wants from the merchant service.

To this lack of officers in a time of sudden need was due the unfortunate policy which prevailed from 1860 to 1867, inclusive, and which has contributed, more than any other cause, to the present stagnation in promotion. During most of this period the numbers in the classes under instruction at the Naval Academy were kept at the highest possible limit, the cadets being pressed to graduation in large numbers and with the utmost rapidity. On the 1st of January, 1865, there were 486 midshipmen in the service, all of whom had entered since the war began. In January, 1866, there were in the Academy 147 midshipmen in the fourth or lowest class alone. Midshipmen were graduated during the years 1866-'67-'68 at an average rate of about 78 per year. In 1862 the demands of the war, and in 1866 a necessary reorganization had each contributed to so increase the numbers as to make promotions to the grade of lieutenant very rapid, but only for a few years to follow. The senior 16 midshipmen of the 78 who were graduated in 1868 became lieutenants in 1872, at an average age of 24. The 12 seniors of this class have been promoted to lieutenant-commanders since the beginning of this year at an average age of 45, and after having served twenty-one years in the grade of lieutenant.

At the same time that this disproportionate number of graduates entered the active service the dates of 1860 and 1861 were further increased by the admission of a number of officers from the volunteer Navy, whose ability and services had entitled them to such recognition on the part of the Government.

Second. The effect of an act passed in 1870 which largely increased the numbers in the lower grades of the line.

Third. The effect of an act passed in August, 1882, which largely decreased the numbers in the higher grades of the line.

The present result of the combined causes mentioned above is shown in the following table, which gives the average ages at which officers of the line now reach the several grades:

Grade.	Age.
Rear-admiral	61
Commodore	59
Captain	50
Commander	48
Lieutenant-commander	46
Lieutenant	36
Junior lieutenant	33

I have endeavored to impress you with my deliberate conviction that this most important branch of the public service, which may properly be termed the right arm of the Republic for external defense, now suffers from two great evils, viz.:

First, a large proportion of the officers of the line of the Navy, at a time when mind and body ought to be at the best, are serving in the lower ranks without command and the habit it begets.

Second. No method now exists whereby the Government can get the very flower of its personnel into those positions where they can be of the greatest service to the country, in consequence of which a dull mechanical movement takes the place of healthy progression led by merit and fitness.

I am engaged in the preparation of a plan for the reorganization of the line of the Navy which I think will meet the requirements of the service, and I shall have the honor to present it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and also to the joint committee, to investigate and consider the subject of the rank, pay, and other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy proposed in the concurrent resolution introduced by the Hon. Mr. MEYER, in case said concurrent resolution becomes a law.

Mr. MEYER. I think this subject is pretty well understood by the Committee of the Whole; and, unless some gentleman who is opposed to the resolution desires to speak——

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to submit a few remarks.

Mr. MEYER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. KILGORE. I will not consume any time needlessly. I do not desire more than ten minutes.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, at what time will the morning hour expire?

The CHAIRMAN. At 25 minutes after 1 o'clock; there are still twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. MEYER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas. I hope that will be sufficient.

Mr. EVERETT. I am anxious to say a very few words on this subject.

Mr. MEYER. I will yield later five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] has the floor for five minutes.

Mr. KILGORE. That does not do me any good.

Mr. MEYER. There are only twenty minutes of the morning hour remaining. I would like to oblige the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. KILGORE. I am not asking any favors.

Mr. MEYER. If the gentleman from Texas will be satisfied to have a vote taken at the proper time, I will yield him ten minutes with very great pleasure.

Mr. KILGORE. I did not understand the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. MEYER. If you will consent that a vote be taken——

Mr. KILGORE. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MEYER. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not know that I shall occupy so much time. I want it understood, however, that in asking ten minutes from my friend from Louisiana I am not making any concession in regard to allowing him to put this matter through without a proper showing on the record.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution, as I understand it, is to secure the appointment of a joint committee of members of this House and the Senate to investigate the rank and pay of the Navy, or as my friend from Arkansas said this morning, to codify the personnel of the Navy. Now, I know so little about this business that I am hardly prepared to give a reason for my opposition to it.

I can say, however, that I am always opposed to an investigation by a Congressional joint committee of any subject within the jurisdiction of a regular standing committee of the House or the Senate. If there were any want of authority in the House Committee on Naval Affairs or the corresponding committee of the Senate to deal with this question, to make this investigation and to formulate a measure as the outcome of the investigation, I might be willing to agree to the appointment of a joint committee to do this work. But there is no such want of authority. My experience is that these special investigating committees are a sham, a fraud, a false pretense, a snare, and a delusion.

Mr. MEYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether the report of a joint committee, if such committee should be constituted by Congress, giving the result of its careful deliberations, would not be as valuable and ought not to be considered as effective as the report of a standing committee of either House.

Mr. KILGORE. Responding to the inquiry of the gentleman from Louisiana, I will say it is barely possible that the report of this joint committee or commission, or whatever it may be called, would be just as full and satisfactory as a report from a standing committee of the House and Senate on the same subject. But that is no reason why the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House or the Senate should abdicate its authority in favor of such a joint committee or commission.

I am opposed to investigations by select committees unless, as I said before, it be on some questions which are not within the jurisdiction of the committees of the House or Senate. Now, if these gentlemen were anxious to reorganize the Navy, and organize some people out and organize some others into higher rank, that might be done by a bill. That is the purpose of this legislation. I think the Navy ought to be reorganized from what they say about it—not what I know, for I confess I do not know much about that. On one or two occasions in the years gone by the Navy was reorganized. In 1855 it was done, if I remember aright, on the same plan and for the same purpose now proposed by the pending resolution, and it was done then on a bill introduced to that end. They did not need a special commission to do the work for the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House or Senate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I want to tell the gentleman that this is not a resolution looking towards a reorganization of the Navy Department at all. It is simply a resolution brought here by the advice of the Secretary of the Navy, a resolution which he himself drew up in the last Congress, asking for a joint committee of both Houses to investigate the personnel of the Navy, an effort to settle troubles connected with the rank, pay, and organization of the Navy. It refers to its personnel—nothing else. The resolution has been brought in here and the gentleman in charge has kindly withdrawn a proposition for a clerk and an attendant, intending to use the force of the committee in the investigation. Therefore the gentleman is misstating the proposition, unintentionally, no doubt.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the gentleman is consuming my time and running a speech into mine—a very good way to get to the country.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am only trying to give the gentleman information. He said he knew nothing about the matter.

Mr. KILGORE. I am obliged to the gentleman.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not disagree with the gentleman from New York. The purpose of the resolution is to investigate the matters and things that I have said, "make an investigation," as they say; and that investigation must have some purpose in it. If not, then it may as well be dropped entirely. If it has any purpose it is to do the very things I have said—that is, to recommend legislation looking to a reorganization of the Navy, a readjustment of the rank of the officers or reassignment of pay, to determine who ought to be promoted, perhaps, and their pay, and who ought to go upon the retired list.

All of this could be accomplished in a direct method by the introduction of a bill in both the House and Senate providing for the very things which they say ought to be done, and let the report be made on it. In that manner let it come before the country and let the country thus be advised as to the intention of Congress in this regard. But the theory is that if they can get a commission, or a joint committee of the House and Senate, to make this investigation and report in favor of a particular scheme or character of legislation—possibly a unanimous report—put it into this House with the sanction of the joint committee of the House and Senate, they can get it through in spite of any opposition which it may encounter in this body.

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen can formulate a measure looking to the very purpose embodied in this resolution, and they ought to do it in that way, not in this. The House has shown repeatedly since this matter has been before it an utter indifference to the resolution. I have not antagonized it in any way except to require the presence of a quorum to vote upon it, and the difficulty of securing a quorum shows the indifference of the House. They may not want to directly antagonize it, or antagonize the gentlemen having it in charge, but there has always been a quorum present when the matter was up, though they have not been able to get one to vote upon it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman found the same difficulty when he called up the Utah bill the other day.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, that is true; but you could not get a quorum for this until I had to help you get it to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MEYER. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT].

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall occupy the time, because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] has practically covered the ground I meant to take—that, in reading the report of the committee, I do not in the least dissent from what they say or what the Secretary of the Navy says in reference to the necessity for a reconstruction of the personnel of the Navy.

I believe that to be the case; and it was the case in 1854 when precisely the same complaints and difficulties, as I happen to know from personal knowledge, young as I was, were raised in the Navy at that time—exactly the same difficulties that we are told now exist. And I find by looking into the proceedings of the second session of the Thirty-third Congress that, this matter having been called to the attention of the Naval committees of the House and Senate by the Secretary of the Navy, Senator Mallory of Florida brought in a bill from the Senate Committee, and stated then "that the committees of the House and Senate," using the plural number, "had been unable to agree on a large part of the matters submitted to them by the Secretary, but had been able to draw up this bill," for the sole purpose the gentleman now alludes to, namely, to recognize the personnel of the Navy, striking down various naval officers from the rank they were unfitted to carry out and for the promotion of others.

Now, the committee in their report state, in a single sentence, that it is impossible that this matter should be carried out in the ordinary method of proceeding, by a report from the Naval Committee of one House, carrying the bill through one House and then passing it through the other.

I wish to see the personnel of the Navy reconstructed. I wish the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy carried out; but I have not understood yet from a single word, either in his report or the report of the committee, or in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], or of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER], why the ordinary proceedings of Congress should be departed from, and why this should not follow the strict precedents of the second session of the Thirty-third Congress by bringing in a bill from the Naval Committee, either of the House or the Senate.

If these gentlemen will show why it is impossible to do that in the ordinary way, and why we need a joint commission, then I will cheerfully vote for their recommendation. I earnestly hope that something will be done to remove what I recognize as existing defects in the personnel of the Navy, but I do not see why, after forty years, we should vary from the precedent of the Thirty-third Congress, established before the late unpleasantness.

Mr. COOMBS. Was not there a report made in the Thirty-third Congress that it was impossible for the two committees to agree?

Mr. EVERETT. They could not agree upon many of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, but on this particular point, of reconstructing the personnel of the Navy, they were enabled to introduce a bill from the Senate committee and have it carried.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If there had been a joint committee of investigation, would they not have agreed?

Mr. EVERETT. I am sure I do not know. I only know that there was not a joint committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is it not more probable that they would have agreed if there had been a joint investigation?

Mr. EVERETT. I can not say as to that.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, the gentleman's argument is just this: He wants the Naval Committee of the House to enter into an investigation of this subject, and then he wants the Naval Committee of the Senate to go through a separate investigation of their own. This would give us two investigations and two separate reports, one in each House. The same object can be accomplished by an investigation by a joint committee of both the Senate and the House. It is proposed that this joint investigation shall not cost the Government one cent, and still the gentleman opposes it.

Mr. EVERETT. I yielded for a question and not for a speech. I beg to state that I have no doubt there are many cases in which a joint committee of the two Houses would carry through a matter much better than we do in the present way; but we have the present way, the regular course of legislation, which we adopt in all our proceedings, and which was adopted for this particular end in 1854; and I am unable to see any reason why we should vary from the regular course of legislation, even if it should be more expeditious.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MEYER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state the result of the action in 1854, to which the gentleman refers us. It made a settlement which did not settle. Since that settlement the trouble between the line and staff of the Navy has occurred. It has rent the personnel of the Navy in twain. They did not settle the question. On the contrary, they split the thing wide open; and the reason why we ask for this joint committee to-day is to make an effort, after an investigation, to settle this difference between the line and staff of the Navy, and give us a navy that will be far more useful than our present Navy is to-day. The Secretary in his annual report says that such action is vitally material.

Mr. COOMBS. There is no use having ships without officers.

Mr. MEYER. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the committee report the pending resolution to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. I think we ought to have a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 8.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, a quorum has not voted.

The Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. MEYER and Mr. KILGORE.

The committee divided; and before tellers reported,

The CHAIRMAN said: The morning hour having expired, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee, having had under consideration concurrent resolution House Mis. Doc. 39, had come to no resolution thereon.

ADMISSION OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER. There is a special order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill H. R. 352.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill H. R. 352.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, if there be no objection, I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the title of that bill was not understood.

Mr. TRACEY. Let us hear what the bill is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. TRACEY. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand that the gentleman from Alabama and I are to control the time?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am willing to divide it with the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Alabama, and the Chair now understands the gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; and the time on the other side will be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. KILGORE. I do not want to put myself in the attitude of having to submit to any control about the time, as I am here——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Alabama yielded to the gentleman from Texas for one hour.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; or for such time as he may desire.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not understand that the gentleman from Alabama is to control the time in favor of the bill. As I understand——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Unless the gentleman from Texas will take control of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Alabama made a minority report and I made the majority report. I do not want any disagreement——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is true the gentleman from Alabama prepared a minority report upon certain provisions of the bill, but upon the general purpose of the bill we are together.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir; it is all right.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Texas should control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama appears to be under the impression that he controls the entire time. Has there been any such agreement in the House?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] will control the time against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any such agreement as that made in the House?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. There has not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then such an understanding would hardly be permissible in committee. The Chairman of the committee would have to recognize gentlemen as they rise.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think it is important. The gentleman from Texas takes the floor.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I shall go on with the discussion of the bill, and I shall not consume much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. For such a time as he desires, or to control the bill.

[Mr. KILGORE withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, if the bill now before the House admitting the Territory of Utah as a State in the Federal Union is to pass and become a law, I certainly hope that the amendment offered by the minority of the committee will be incorporated in it. I refer to the amendment in relation to polygamy, which is as follows:

The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship. But said constitution shall prohibit polygamy or dual marriage, and polygamy or dual marriage shall be declared by such a constitution to be felony and punishable by any of the courts of said State of competent jurisdiction by inflicting a fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000, and confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one year or more than five years.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] has addressed this House for an hour, and that hour has been devoted to an attempt to establish the fact that the Mormons in the Territory of Utah have abandoned the practice of polygamy. He has quoted President Harrison as an authority upon that point. Let us see. I have a faint memory of a speech which President Harrison delivered at Salt Lake City in that magnificent tour of the country which he made in which he made a number and variety of addresses perhaps unequaled by any President since John Quincy Adams.

I say I have a faint memory that President Harrison on that tour made a speech at Salt Lake City, in which he said to the assembled Mormons that he believed "in one and only one uncrowned queen in every American home," and I am inclined to think that that remark had some application to the state of things existing in Utah at that time as seen by President Harrison.

I also desire to call attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to the following significant remark in the report of the minority of the committee:

The Delegate from Utah was invited to be present, and amendments were made at his suggestion, and, as the committee understood, he was perfectly satisfied with all parts of the bill except that part which prohibited polygamy.

And I will refer to this subject later on.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to stand in my place and say that I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to admitting the Territory of Utah as a State in the Federal Union. I have a brother (a Gentile) who lived two years in Salt Lake City, and I think I have some inside information about Utah.

To be sure, it has the requisite wealth and population, but in my judgment, and from what I can learn, the character of the population and the character and practices of the Mormon Church, to which a majority of its citizens belong and to which they owe their first allegiance, unfits that Territory and its people to become members of the Federal Union.

The history of Mormonism from the time that Brigham Young made his pilgrimage and located, what he chose to style the Church of the Latter-Day Saints, on the shores of the Great Salt Lake down to a very recent time has been a history of superstition, licentiousness, murder, and crime that is a disgrace to civilization, and one of the foulest, blackest blots on the pages of history.

The Mountain Meadow massacre, the doctrine of "blood atonement," the damnable crimes of the "endowment house," the doctrine of plural marriages, the persecution and wholesale murder of apostates and Gentiles who resisted or denied the authority of the Mormon Church, the crimes of the "Danites" or "destroying angels," a band of bloodthirsty assassins employed to execute the will of the Mormon Church, are all matters of history and fresh in the memories of the living generation.

But, says the gentleman from Texas and say the supporters of this bill, the Mormon Church has changed, has abandoned polygamy. Well, if they have, I propose for one that they shall "do works meet for repentance" for a term of years longer, and until the Gentile Protestant Christian element in that Territory and the opponents of Mormonism, either by uniting with some other Territory or otherwise, shall become a majority, and be able to control the Legislature of the new State which is to be formed. Otherwise I am fearful that when the State shall be fairly inside the Union, the president of the Mormon Church, the successor of Joe Smith and Brigham Young, will have another revelation, reëstablishing the "destroying angels," the "blood atonement," the "endowment house," and polygamy.

Mr. Speaker, I have no confidence in either the honesty or the sincerity of the recent professed change of sentiment on the part of the Mormon leaders in regard to the subject of polygamy. Unless my information is faulty, the damnable crimes of the "endowment house" are still perpetrated in secret, polygamy has only been temporarily abandoned, and the persecution, ostracism, and bad treatment of Gentiles, especially of Christian teachers sent among them, continues.

Unfortunately, I left at my hotel a clipping which I have from the Salt Lake Tribune, and which I will ask permission to incorporate in my remarks, giving an account of the recent outrageous treatment of two female Protestant school teachers in the Mormon kingdom—outrageous and shameful treatment, I say, and apparently justified by the Mormon authorities. At least, the perpetrators of these outrages were never prosecuted.

Then, there is another serious objection to the admission of the Territory as a State. Probably there is not a Territory or State in the country so largely peopled by those who have absolutely no knowledge of our country, of its laws, of its institutions, and what should constitute a free State in the great Republic.

Not an inconsiderable part of the inhabitants of this Territory are the dregs of European governments, gathered in hordes by the Mormon missionaries in Europe and ticketed through from Liverpool, Berlin, Vienna, and Stockholm to what they are led to believe is the modern Zion, the New Jerusalem, and a land flowing with milk and honey.

And while other immigrants to this country become to some extent at least Americanized by their surroundings, no such happy change takes place among the foreign immigrants to this God-forsaken Mormon city.

The Republican party in its earliest conventions denounced the twin barbarisms, slavery and polygamy, and pledged itself to the overthrow of both. The first promise has been redeemed, at the expense of rivers of blood, thousands of lives, and billions of treasure. And, thank God, it is no longer a parody, as it was at the birth of the Republican party, to sing—

> The star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave
> O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

The twin relic of barbarism, polygamy, still lives. And while it does live and is in the ascendency I can never vote to admit Utah as a State of the Union.

Mr. COGSWELL. All the evidence is against you. The evidence is that it has been exterminated.

Mr. MORSE. What is that?

Mr. COGSWELL. All the record evidence is in favor of the extermination of polygamy in Utah.

Mr. MORSE. Well, Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, has got more faith in the Mormons and their promises than I have. He has some confidence in their promises, and I have none. I would not give a pinch of snuff for the promises of a whole regiment of Mormons, from my brother's experience for two years amongst the people of that Territory.

Mr. COGSWELL. But you preach repentance, and that it is at all times in order. Now, following your preaching, I believe that there are people who do repent and that there are times of repentance. There is every reason to believe that these people have repented.

Mr. MORSE. My colleague is exactly right on one point; I do believe in repentance. I believe in the good old hymn that says—

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

But I want evidence of that repentance. I want to know that this Mormon hierarchy has abandoned "blood atonement" for one thing; I want to know that they have abandoned the despicable crimes of the "endowment house," which have been committed by them in times past. I want to know and be sure of the fact that they have abandoned polygamy, and I am not prepared to take their statements unsupported by evidence. Therefore, as I said a little while ago, before I am willing to vote to admit them as a State into the Federal Union, I want these people, with their hands reeking with crime, with fingers red with the blood of the Mountain Meadow massacre, to bring forth fruit meet for repentance.

Mr. BRODERICK. They are all dead; that crowd.

Mr. MORSE. I wish they were. But they are not. The United States Government tried, convicted, and took one man back, John D. Lee, and shot him at the point where the crime was committed; and the only misfortune about the transaction is that they executed only the subaltern. They ought to have brought up his superior officers also, whose orders he obeyed, and executed them in the place where the foul crime was committed.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that there is a large Gentile element inhabiting the Territory of Utah, utterly opposed to the Mormon hierarchy, the Mormon Church, the endowment house, and to polygamy. And in their name and in their behalf I oppose the present admission of Utah as a State.

I predict that if this bill shall pass, and the government of that Territory shall pass from the United States to State and Mormon control, that legislation hostile to the missionaries and teachers and to the non-Mormon residents will be among the first acts of the Mormon Legislature.

Once admitted as a State, once let the Federal Government surrender its control and the power of the Federal Government to right the wrongs of the non-Mormon is lost and lost forever.

Mr. COGSWELL. That is in the bill. The bill provides that their constitution shall make provision that no discrimination shall be made. How can they in view of the enabling act?

Mr. MORSE. I see that in the bill; but my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts knows full well that we have certain amendments—the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth—to the Constitution, that apply especially to certain great sections of the country that are a dead letter, and civil and political rights are denied to millions of our countrymen. He knows that there are members of the House representing constituencies here elected by 1,500 votes when it took 30,000 votes to secure the election of my distinguished colleague. He knows full well how these Mormon people and a Mormon Legislature may paralyze these provisions of the bill, and especially so when the sentiment of a large majority of the people are against it.

Once admit them to statehood and these provisions can be made nugatory, null, and void. I repeat, sir, once admit them as a State, once let the Federal Government surrender the Territory and the power of the Federal Government to right the wrongs committed by the Mormons and protect its citizens in that Territory is lost and lost forever.

Mr. Chairman, I do not see the need for haste about this business. There is time enough in the future to admit Utah as a State. We have already admitted States to the Union for political purposes. And I confess, sir, with shame and mortification that my party is to blame for some of it. Yes, we have admitted States for political purposes, mere mining camps. We have admitted States whose population has decreased within the last decade. There is a State in this Union with two Senators and one Representative on this floor that has less than one-quarter of the population contained in my district alone. I say we have had enough of that business. There is no haste about admitting more States.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Is it not as big as Delaware?

Mr. MORSE. Not in population, I think.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I mean in representation. Delaware has but one Representative.

Mr. MORSE. What is the population of Delaware?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. MORSE. Well it has a population two or three times the size of the State I refer to.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. She was one of the original thirteen, however.

Mr. MORSE. Delaware has a right in the Union as a State; a mining camp has not. Rhode Island, let me say to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, has a right in this Union beyond that of a mining camp. Rhode Island and Delaware were in at the birth of the Union; they won their place in the great Federal Union by sacrifice of blood and treasure in the great cause of liberty in the war of the Revolution.

Mr. Chairman, Rhode Island and Delaware are both symbolized in the original stars of the flag that hangs over your head, whose folds, set with blue, signalize the starry firmament of God. I say Delaware and Rhode Island, which were among the original States that fought for the independence of this country, have rights that no mining camp can have.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. We did not have any chance to be in that fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. Well, I am not finding fault with the gentleman from Washington because he was not born at that time.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman ought not to complain of States west of the Missouri River because we did not take any part in the revolutionary war.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. After all, is not the objection which the gentleman has to this bill caused by the fact that it allows another Western State in the Union a representation upon the floor of Congress? Is it not that instead of polygamy that he is objecting to?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the gentleman from South Dakota does me an injustice. I do not really believe he means the insinuation which he makes by that remark.

Mr. PICKLER. Your late argument would indicate that.

Mr. MORSE. No, I beg your pardon. I think I am thoroughly honest and that if it were not for the moral conditions of Utah I would join with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] and every other man on this floor in admitting that State.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman pardon me for another interruption?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman has spoken very eloquently and feelingly with reference to Rhode Island and Delaware, and their services in behalf of American freedom. But is it not true that they came into the Union in much the same manner that McGregor took a seat at the table? Was it not with the understanding that the head of the table should be wherever McGregor sat, and that they would not consent to anything until they secured a certain amount of representation? Is it not a fact that they demanded two United States Senators for their little bailiwicks, and that they are now complaining of the representation that we have got in the West, and that they would not consent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution until they secured the representation which they now have? Is not that the history of it, or am I mistaken in regard to it?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I believe Rhode Island was one of the last States to consent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON] is correct.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. They were in at the beginning, and they secured the lion's share while they had the opportunity. We are coming in a little late, and are trying to secure a portion of what is left.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I have already given the reasons why I think Delaware and Rhode Island belong in the Union. There was great difficulty about the adoption of the Constitution, as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON] knows; and the gentleman well knows that George Washington, the father of his country, said in the Convention which framed the Federal Constitution, when there was great danger that the instrument would be rejected, that if this instrument were rejected he believed the next constitution would be drawn in blood.

I am not here to argue the question of representation in the other end of this Capitol. Our fathers wisely, as it seemed to them, gave to each State in the Union, without regard to its size, equal representation in the Senate of the United States. I believe the men who made the Constitution were as august, and honorable, and patriotic, and wise a body of men as ever assembled on God's green earth; but I do not think there is any justification in that fact for the admission of a State with 40,000 population, which has the same representation in the other end of this building as the great State of New York, or Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Utah has 250,000 population.

Mr. MORSE. I am not making an argument against Utah on the ground of a lack of population.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What evidence have you as to the moral condition there, as against the testimony from every source, Mormon or anti-Mormon, in the Territory or in the neighboring Territories?

Mr. MORSE. My argument is based upon my want of confidence in the honesty and integrity of the Mormons. I have no confidence in their professions, and I have already pointed out the danger of the Federal Government losing control of this Territory and turning the non-Mormons and Gentiles over to the tender mercies of that Mormon Legislature.

My information in regard to the affairs of Utah, and especially its past condition and practices, is derived from two sources: First, as already stated, I have a brother, who represented a coal-mining company and was a resident of that city for two years; but my second and fullest source of information is a book published by Eliza Young, "The Fifteenth Wife of Brigham Young," who apostatized from Mormonism, escaped from Salt Lake City, and, I think, lectured extensively upon Utah and Mormonism, and in the book to which I have referred gave an exhaustive and detailed account of the religion and practices of the Mormons and Mormon Church, with names, dates, and figures, none of which to my knowledge have ever been controverted or denied.

The statements of this book are believed to be veritable facts and veritable history.

The teaching and preaching of the Mormon bishops, apostles, and elders in the Mormon tabernacle are fully described, and some of this preaching is described as unfit for a pothouse, and so indecent as to make a stone image blush for shame. The crime of the Mountain Meadow massacre and the responsibility of the Mormon leaders for the same, is fully set forth and proven. The murderous assassinations, with dates and particulars, of those disobedient to the Mormon Church by a band of assassins, otherwise known as the "Danites" or "destroying angels," who invariably cut the throats of their victims, are also fully set forth. The doctrine of the blood atonement, by which numerous women had their throats cut by their husbands as a religious sacrifice, with names, dates, and particulars, is also fully described. The conduct and ceremony of the endowment house and the business of sealing plural wives, of which the writer claimed to be an eyewitness on repeated occasions, are also described. Undoubtedly most of the actors in these terrible scenes have answered for their crimes or superstitions at the court of last resort, which includes the father of this infamy, Brigham Young.

I do not charge the present residents of Utah to any extent with sanctioning or countenancing these crimes. While, as already stated, I have grave doubts as to whether or no the practice of polygamy has been wholly and in good faith abandoned, most undoubtedly a change for the better has taken place since the building of the Pacific Railroad and since the large influx of Gentiles to that Territory, and I am inclined to concede that no such crimes or superstitions could ever again obtain such a foothold among the inhabitants of that Territory as did prevail at the time to which I have referred; but that there is an immense amount of superstition remaining, that there is a blind obedience to the authorities of the church, no matter what commands they may give, I insist is still true, and I contend that it is not yet safe, wise, or politic to remove from that Territory the hand of the Federal Government and transer to a Mormon Legislature the making and enforcing of the laws which shall govern that people.

The claim is made here that there is no opposition in Utah to the Territory becoming a State. If that claim is true, there exists there now a very different state of things from what has existed when application has heretofore been made for statehood, when a protest loud and long has come up from the Gentile population against being turned over to the tender mercies of the Mormons, and against having the strong arm of the United States Government withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman know that the non-Mormon people out there are a pretty robust set of fellows, and can take care of themselves?

Mr. MORSE. The gentleman from Washington knows there is a very large population south of here that is not able to take care of itself.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. That is a different condition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. MORSE. They are not able to take care of themselves. That is the condition of those people.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives: I will not trespass upon the House further than to conclude with this remark: I stand in my place and say, in the name of civilization, in the name of virtue and morality and education and religion, in the name of American liberty, in the name of the good name and prosperity of the American Republic, I denounce the proposition to admit the Mormon Territory of Utah as a State in the Federal Union.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GOODNIGHT in the chair). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. Is it in order to submit an amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order yet, as the bill is still under general discussion, and until general debate has expired amendments are not in order.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Chairman, Congress, under the Constitution, may admit new States and shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government. It is not required to undertake for the intelligence, the morality, the sobriety, the peace, or good order, and much less the religion, of the people of a State. The framers of the Constitution absolved the Congress from any such responsibility. The Territorial form of government is maintained largely at the national expense. In every case it is intended to be but temporary, and exist only until the Territory attains such population and such wealth that the people are able to conduct their own affairs and defray the expenses which are entailed in the administration of the State government.

The experience, since 1789, in the admission of new States indicates fairly well what population, what wealth, a Territory should possess in order to fit it for admission to the dignity of statehood. The actual, as distinguished from the potential, wealth and population have usually been disregarded. Anything like a religious test has been precluded as contrary to the Constitution and the genius of our institutions. So far Congress has not found it necessary to devise a method by which to measure the intelligence, morality, or generally the quality of the population knocking at the door for admission into the Union. Under some circumstances it may not be unreasonable to suppose that the forty-four States, embracing people who have good opinions of themselves, would display some taste as to the qualities and characteristics of the population whom they would be willing to admit into the select circle constituting the sisterhood of the Republic.

As for the people of Utah, I want to say that they shrink from no test not violative of the fundamental principles upon which our institutions rest, which even the most fastidious or exacting can see fit to apply. I propose to demonstrate in every respect the fitness of the Territory I represent for admission into the Union. In population, in wealth, in resources, in knowledge of our institutions, in standard of education, and in all the qualities that make intelligent and progressive citizens the people of Utah are fit for association with the proudest and best of the members of the Federal Union. And after having investigated the characteristics and quality of the people of Utah, and made comparisons of them with the people living in other States and Territories, aye, in the State of Massachusetts, I rise possessed of a knowledge which fills my heart with a just pride in the people whom I have the honor here to represent.

There have been, I believe, six applications made by the Territory of Utah for admission into the Union. The last of these applications was made in 1888. In every former instance those applying were members, generally, of the Mormon Church; and there came here, opposing the admission of the Territory, non-Mormons of Utah and the non-Mormons residing in the surrounding Territories or States. The objections which have been made in former times to the admission of Utah have not been on account of the lack of population or of wealth or resources.

Two questions have been made: First, the existence of a sentiment in the Territory which predominated, and which tolerated the practice of polygamy—a practice generally regarded as repugnant to the civilization and morality of the age; and second, the alleged interference of the Mormon Church in political and civil affairs; and on these two grounds and on these two grounds alone Congress has been reluctant and hesitated to admit the Territory into the Union. In 1888 the case was tried before the Committee on Territories in a very elaborate hearing. Majority and minority reports were presented. The majority in its report uses this language:

> From what has now been stated it is apparent that all the conditions exist in Utah, in a marked degree, necessary to entitle the people of that Territory to have a State government; and it is equally apparent that, by reason of her geographical position, her immense agricultural and mineral resources, her accumulated wealth, and the general intelligence and industrious and energetic character of her people, it is of national importance that Utah should have a State government.
> "The objections that are alleged against the admission are:
>
> First. The existence of polygamy.
> Second. The power and the teachings of the Mormon Church on that subject.

It was found in 1882 there were 2,225 adult male polygamists in the Territory of Utah. This report proceeds to say:

> It is not denied by the advocates of admission that polygamy is practiced in that Territory, but they claim that it is not obligatory upon the members of the Mormon Church, that it has been gradually dying out until now there are comparatively few who are living in polygamous relations, and that this few are generally past the meridian of life. They claim that polygamous marriages have ceased to be solemnized, that in the near future polygamy will have ceased to exist altogether, and is even now practically dead, and that it is unjust to deprive the many of political rights because the comparatively few are violating the law in this regard."

Mr. DINGLEY. Was that in 1882?

Mr. RAWLINS. This is the report made in 1888.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the statement based upon the number that were disqualified from voting?

Mr. RAWLINS. The act of Congress that disqualified polygamists to vote or hold office in Utah was passed in 1882. The Utah Commission was appointed, and they prescribed or recommended a test oath, under the operation of which all polygamists were excluded from voting. Female suffrage prevailed in the Territory at that time, and it was reported that about 10,000 males and females were disqualified from voting under the operation of the act of 1882. To be a polygamist a man must have two or more wives, and all the wives were disqualified under the act of 1882. These figures were ascertained by a calculation which showed that there were 2,225 adult males in the Territory of Utah who were polygamists in 1882.

The majority report of the committee in 1888 found that the practice of polygamy had been decreasing. It was claimed then by the representatives of the Mormon people that polygamy had been forbidden by the church, and they asserted that it was no longer in existence and would not revive. The majority gave some credit to that statement. The minority report (presented by Mr. Struble of Iowa) states the objections that were made at that time to the admission of the Territory, which were, the existence of polygamy and alleged church interference.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then, as I understand, the number of persons practicing polygamy at that time was determined solely by the number of persons who were disqualified from voting?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Those who declined to take the test oath?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. But by that method the whole number may not have been ascertained, because there may have been others who did not apply to vote.

Mr. RAWLINS. The gentleman from Maine will remember that it was made perjury to take the oath falsely, and that a man who had been a polygamist in years past and who had more than one wife and had had children born to him of such marriage, could not well conceal the fact. Polygamists were eliminated from the registration lists.

The relation was such that it could not be concealed. Acts of Congress had put the enforcement of the law in the hands of the United States marshal, and numerous deputies and United States commissioners existed throughout the Territory. All the means of ascertaining who were polygamists were at hand, including ample funds for the arrest, conviction, and punishment of offenders.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has my friend any means of ascertaining from any other statistical source within the Territory the number of polygamists in Utah at that time?

Mr. RAWLINS. Another test, I suppose, would be to ascertain the number arrested and convicted. There were some ten people arrested for polygamy during the years of the active enforcement of these laws. They were men who had married after 1882 and within three years next prior to the finding of the indictments. But the statute did not run as against persons who were guilty of unlawful cohabitation. Unlawful cohabitation consisted in this: Where a man, having previously married more than one wife, still held to the relation by associating with the unlawful wife and holding her out to the world as his wife even though there may have been no sexual intercourse.

Such was the definition of unlawful cohabitation given by the Supreme Court of the United States. Men who had married, years before, two wives, and had had children born to them of the polygamous marriage, would perhaps visit the household of the unlawful wife and family in order to provide them with the necessaries of life, and the proof would be made that the man had visited the woman, and that, being her husband, they had associated as husband and wife, and upon the submission of such proof to the jury the man would be convicted of unlawful cohabitation. If we apply as a test the number of people who were arrested and shown to be guilty of polygamy, then there were only ten such arrests and convictions, and, for unlawful cohabitation, less than five hundred. That was the result after years of prosecution and after the exertion of the utmost diligence and zeal in the arrest, condemnation, and punishment of offenders against those laws. The people who in 1888 said that polygamy was practically dead said the truth. We all know that it is the nature of man to be more willing to yield a fact than to concede an error.

The leaders of the Mormon people had for years said to them that this thing had been commanded by the Almighty, and that they would be protected if only they would conform to this tenet or doctrine of their faith. In spite of all the propagandism of polygamy that was brought to bear among the Mormon people from its establishment in 1853 down to the cessation of its teaching in 1887, it even having been urged that this practice was essential to the salvation of the members of the church, there was never but a small percentage of those people who practiced this doctrine, as is shown by official reports which have been made from time to time to the President or to the Secretary of the Interior.

I say that the former applications for the admission of Utah into the Union have been largely made on the part of the Mormon people or the representatives of the Mormon people. I come not here as the representative of the Mormon Church or any other church. I come not here as an advocate of the practice of polygamy, for I believe it is vicious and ought to have been suppressed, as it has been. But I do come here, I am proud to say, as the representative of the people of Utah, irrespective of religion, creed, or politics, and if there is any opposition in that Territory now to the admission of Utah into the Union I have been unable to discover it.

In 1888, as shown by the minority report of the Committee on Territories, we found here advocating the admission of Utah into the Union Hon. John T. Caine, at that time Delegate from Utah, Mr. F. S. Richards, Hon. Mark A. Smith, Delegate from Arizona, and Mr. WILSON of Washington. Those who opposed admission were Governor West, of Utah, E. P. Perry, of Park City, Judges Baskin and McBride of Utah, Hon. FRED T. DUBOIS, Delegate from Idaho.

As it has been intimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] that the present Delegate from Utah has some sinister motive in advocating the admission of Utah under the bill favorably reported by the committee, I would like to invite his attention to the fact that it is very cheap and easy to stand up and denounce a thing which all around you condemn, when you are in the popular current, when there is nobody opposed to what you say; but the highest evidence of sincerity is that when the current of popular sympathy is against you, you are outspoken in your convictions. I was born in the Territory of Utah; I have witnessed all the stages of its progress and development. And I did not wait until it became popular to say that polygamy ought to be discontinued and that the church ought to take its hand out of politics.

In 1885, at a public meeting in the theater in Salt Lake City, I said to the Mormon people themselves that polygamy must and should be given up, that it would be suppressed, and that they would save themselves much misfortune and suffering if they would acquiesce in the sentiment which so thoroughly prevailed in the nation that it would not be balked or thwarted. I said to those people then and there that the union of church and state in so far as it had existed must cease to exist. And in 1887, when I was invited to participate in the constitutional convention as the chairman of a Democratic club, I said that that club was in favor of the admission of Utah upon these conditions, that the sentiment of the people of the Territory should become predominant in favor of obedience to the law and the cessation of the practice of polygamy, and that the church cease its interference in political and civil matters. I stated that when I was convinced that this condition existed in the public sentiment of the Territory, I would gladly cooperate and do what I could to procure for the Territory admission into the Union.

Now, when those utterances were made they were made in sincerity. In 1885 many of those with whom I had been associated believed differently. I was subjected to some criticism. I recur to that occasion to make this allusion. When any gentleman intimates or hints to me that I have any covert purpose here in advocating the admission of the Territory of Utah in order that polygamy may be revived, I ask him to read the history on this subject. I will compare records with him or anyone.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question right there?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORSE. Is it not a fact that prior to the election of the gentleman, the Territory of Utah sent here as their Representative Mr. Cannon, a man who had six wives?

Mr. RAWLINS. No, sir.

Mr. MORSE. How many wives did he have?

Mr. RAWLINS. You mean George Q. Cannon?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir. He was a polygamist, was he not?

Mr. RAWLINS. That is ancient history, my friend. Mr. Caine has represented Utah here; he was my predecessor as the Delegate from the Territory. He served here ten years. Mr. Caine is not a polygamist. In 1882 Mr. Cannon, the polygamist you speak of, was excluded from his seat in Congress on account of his polygamy.

Mr. MORSE. But he represented the sentiment of those people all the same, because they elected and sent him here.

Mr. RAWLINS. They elected him in years gone by. I am not denying, my dear friend, that in 1853 or 1860 or 1875 or 1880 polygamy was practiced in Utah. I am not denying that the people of that Territory elected polygamists to office in those old days. But the gentleman does not seem to know that the world does progress. [Applause.] There is nothing under the sun that is not changeable and subject to alteration. And that being so, the gentleman himself had better be careful.

Who was responsible for the education of the men who established polygamy in Utah? I tell you, Mr. Chairman, the men who are responsible for it originally were born, were bred, were educated under the system and civilization of New England. [Applause.]

I tell the gentleman now that the moral sentiment which led to its adoption in Utah, which led to that feature which is obnoxious, and, in my opinion, ought never to prevail, was the outgrowth of that puritanical sentiment which in some of its excrescences in the older days burnt witches, persecuted Quakers, drove out from the community Roger Williams, and later produced the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MORSE. I would like to say to the gentleman that when he says witches were burned in Massachusetts he falsifies history.

Mr. RAWLINS. But, Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed with my argument to state that all of these gentlemen whom I have named, and who were opposed to the admission of Utah as a State in 1888, every one of them now, so far I know, is in favor of its admission. Governor West in his report, which I have in my hand, one of the chief men who opposed it, perhaps more violently than any other, says:

> The practice of polygamy has been abandoned by the church and the people. Polygamous marriages are forbidden by the authorities of the Church. The people or church party has been dissolved, and the conditions existing in the Territory are now in nowise different from those in vogue in the States of the Union.

That is corroborated by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Baskin, who for years fought the church, and came here as a representative to oppose the admission of the Territory into the Union, and now is in accord with what has been stated by Governor West. He is now mayor of Salt Lake City, was elected on political lines, just as is done in other parts of the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, the surrounding States, the non-Mormons in the neighboring States, the people who have lived nearest to the Mormon people and are most familiar with the situation there, who constitute the best witnesses because they have a chance to see and know, and because they judge at their own peril when they so speak, say these people now are eligible to statehood, and that they are in favor of the admission of the Territory into the Union. At the time of the admission of the Territory of Idaho, under the law authorized by its constitution unfriendly to the Mormons—and there is a great body of them in that Territory—all these people were disfranchised and disabled to hold office.

At the last session of the Legislature of Idaho the disabilities imposed upon the Mormon people were, by unanimous vote of the members of the Legislature of both parties, all of them Gentiles, because no Mormon had a seat there, removed, and therefore they have expressed their opinion and belief—the people who will be most liable to be affected by it—that the Mormon people were fit to exercise and be intrusted with all the rights and duties of citizenship under State government. The people of Wyoming and the neighboring States are of the same opinion, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], dealing largely in ancient history, has asked permission to include a clipping from the Salt Lake Tribune, long published in Salt Lake City, of great circulation, which has been supposed to always give expression to the most violent and hostile sentiments against the Mormon people. I have some editorials here taken from the Salt Lake Tribune myself. When I paid a visit recently to the Territory of Utah I announced in an interview published in the Tribune, first, that I would encounter no opposition from home in reaching the immediate enactment of the statehood bill, and that I proposed to come back here and do what I could as speedily as possible to bring about the early enactment of that bill.

It was stated in this interview, as preliminary to it, that every editor in the Territory of Utah is in accord with my views on this subject. The Salt Lake Tribune, on November 19, 1893, published an editorial in which they said they approved of my conduct here and what I proposed to do. On November 17, in an editorial under the title "Let Statehood Come," the editor uses this language:

> On the statehood question, and in urging those in power to continue their their efforts and in promising them no opposition that we know of, we are entirely sincere.

Then there is no opposition to statehood from any quarter amongst those who are most interested—who are vitally interested in the question.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman give the name of the editor of the Salt Lake Tribune?

Mr. RAWLINS. Judge C. C. Goodwin.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Let me ask the gentleman if that paper is not also a Republican journal?

Mr. RAWLINS. It is a Republican paper, and has always been.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And is it not entirely Gentile, that is to say, anti-Mormon?

Mr. RAWLINS. It has always been regarded as a representative of the non-Mormon or Gentile element in the Territory and in the surrounding States and Territories.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman pardon me if I ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is there any reason now existing in the Territory of Utah why there should be an anti-Mormon paper?

Mr. RAWLINS. There is no anti-Mormon paper now. That paper has assumed to speak for the Gentiles of the Territory in the past.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. There is no distinction now in your Territory between Gentile and Mormon papers?

Mr. RAWLINS. There is no distinction The people of the Territory of Utah, in politics, in convictions, in sentiment, in purpose, are like the people of every other State and Territory in this Union.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Another question. Is not your Legislature Republican?

Mr. RAWLINS. I am sorry to say that at present the Legislature is Republican.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I am only assisting the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. I know, you are trying to convert your friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], and you have a pretty hard task. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Washington. No, sir; I deny the soft impeachment. You do me honor overmuch. I can not perform impossibilities. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Now, if I may be permitted to proceed, the average of the population of the thirteen original States was 236,000. The average of the population of the States which have been admitted since, at the date of their admission down to the present time, is 113,000. Utah to-day has 240,000, all white people, with the exception of 2,000. Three-fourths of them are native-born citizens of the United States. All of them, with the exception of about 3 or 4 per cent, can read and write the English language. The standard of intelligence and education is far above the average of the American people. It is on a dead level with that of Connecticut.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about Massachusetts?

Mr. RAWLINS. Utah has a less percentage of foreign-born people than Massachusetts. One-third of the people of Massachusetts are foreign born. Three-fourths of the people of Utah are native born. We have a less percentage of foreign-born people than Massachusetts, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Washington, Idaho, Oregon, California, or Nevada. Do the foreign people come from the dregs? Why, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] would come to Utah and meet some of the men born, educated, and brought up there, he would feel that he had struck a country in which he was in reality a tenderfoot, and had something to learn. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. I have seen some of these Morman immigrants on the wharf in New York and Boston.

Mr. RAWLINS. No; somebody fooled you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. No, they did not.

Mr. BRETZ. That was not hard to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. I say the foreigners who are there come from England, Switzerland, and from Scandinavia. They are sturdy, independent, progressive, and obstinate, too. They are not a servile race. They are not easily dictated to or controlled. They have all the characteristics of the peoples from whom they come; and to transplant a man from one country to another does not change the blood which flows in his veins.

A large percentage of those people classed as Mormons have for years been at heart opposed to the practice of polygamy. They have not yielded to any ecclesiastical dictation because they liked it. Their solidity has been largely due to the situation and to the conditions in which they found themselves. In the enactment of needed legislation to suppress polygamy, in clothing the marshals with most extraordinary and unusual powers, in the zeal to suppress what was conceived to be an outrage upon civilization, the limitations of the law have not always been duly regarded, and jurors have been selected for the purpose of convicting upon the slightest evidence, which would be regarded elsewhere as but a pretense of evidence.

These things have led those people, many of whom were in favor of the discontinuance of the practice of polygamy, to believe that some of their friends were being persecuted; and so long as that condition existed they banded together to shield themselves and their friends from what they conceived to be injustice. The menace which has threatened what they conceived to be sacred to their consciences, and only a question between themselves and their God, led them to think perhaps that they were being persecuted. They are obstinate. Hence it has been that when any question of that kind arose they have stood together, as the people of the South have stood together, as the people of the North have stood together, as any people would stand together.

Now, when polygamy was yielded—as it was in fact yielded in 1887, when that question was eliminated—there was no reason any longer for the Mormon people to stand together.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, he said that the people of the South had been standing together for a thing that was probably wrong. Was he referring to the late silver fight? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. I could not have been referring to that, because they did not stand together. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is it not a fact that the Mormon vote was divided up between yourself and your opponent at the last election, to a great extent?

Mr. RAWLINS. It was.

Mr. PENCE. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not a fact that your competitor for the seat you now hold was the Republican candidate, Mr. Frank Cannon; and is he not the son of the Cannon referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] here awhile ago.

Mr. RAWLINS. He is.

Mr. PENCE. The regular Republican candidate?

Mr. RAWLINS. He was.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman permit another question from the West? If Utah is admitted into the Union as a State, will it dispose of the Ute question and their removal from Colorado?

Mr. RAWLINS. I think we will take the whites and leave Colorado the Indians, if we can get into the Union. [Laughter.]

Now, I am entirely willing to talk over this matter, and I am desirous of answering any question that is pertinent to this issue, that will tend to make plain to the members of this House that Utah is fit to be admitted into the Union.

I was proceeding to state that the population and the education of the people of Utah was such as to entitle them to be admitted into the Union. I desire to say one thing further. Not only is the standard of education high—it is far above the average, as the returns upon that subject will show—but the people of Utah are entitled to more than ordinary credit for that condition, because during the forty years' existence of the Territory not an acre of land, not a dollar in money, has been made by any grant of the Federal Government available for the purposes of supporting education in that Territory.

The schoolhouses have been built, the expenses of maintaining the school system has been borne, wholly by taxes voluntarily imposed by the people upon themselves. For twenty years we have had a university maintained by funds granted by the Legislature out of the Territorial treasury and derived from taxation, under which opportunities were given to obtain the higher branches of learning. Some two thousand or three thousand young men and women have availed themselves of the opportunities afforded by that university, and they have gone out in the Territory and have disseminated the intelligence and knowledge they thus acquired. The man who supposes that there has been no progress in Utah during the last twenty or thirty years certainly does not understand or appreciate the situation. I am not going to defend some of the deeds that were committed in years gone by. Why, outrages have been committed in every community, in every state of civilization.

Mr. HARTMAN. And they did not advocate the burning of people for witchcraft?

Mr. RAWLINS. No. I do not defend the men who participated in the Mountain Meadow massacre. That was an atrocious and cruel butchery.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Which occurred before you were born.

Mr. RAWLINS. No, I was 7 years old then; but I did not participate in it. [Laughter.] Of course the gentleman from Massachusetts, being a Christian gentleman, I suppose, would visit the sins of the parents upon the children to the third and fourth generation. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Because he is not a Mormon.

Mr. RAWLINS. I want to say that those who were at the head of that crime were arraigned; some of them were executed; and they are all dead. Speak of any other outrage committed twenty, thirty, forty, or sixty years ago and who was responsible for it; will any gentleman point to any man in Utah who is amenable and responsible for any such outrage? As well say that the Senator from Wyoming is responsible for the massacre of Chinamen at Rock Springs; as well say that the people of Louisiana are responsible for the assault upon the Italians who were helpless and imprisoned; as well say that the people over here in Pennsylvania, at the time of the Carnegie trouble—those civilized and intelligent people of Pennsylvania, endowed with all the opportunities and privileges of citizenship of a State—as well say that they are responsible for the acts of the women there who in a moment were transformed into tigresses, gouging out the eyes of the prisoners as they were marched by; as well say that all the people of Pennsylvania are to be held responsible for that as to say that the people of this day and generation in Utah are responsible for any outrages that may have occurred there years ago.

There is less polygamy, as shown by the records in the last ten years, in Utah, made known and which has come to light in proportion to population than there has been in the same time in the State of Massachusetts. [Great laughter and applause.] Now, I know the gentleman will say this, as he did say, that these marriages are solemnized in secret, where nobody can see and nobody can hear.

Mr. MORSE. That is right.

Mr. RAWLINS. Then how does the gentleman know it. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. How does the gentleman know that George Washington was the first President of the United States?

Mr. RAWLINS. But the gentleman said that these things took place in secret. As to what takes place in secret, if we should uncover all the misdeeds that are committed in Utah, in Washington, in Massachusetts, what would be disclosed in all its nakedness none but the all-seeing Eye can tell.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Washington State, or Washington city? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Both. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, there is a presumption when a man is arraigned for crime that he is innocent because the rule is in favor of right conduct, of decency, and of morality. A man who charges to the contrary has the burden of proving it. And the rule is a just one. It has come down as a part of the common law and as an incident of our civilization. When an individual is charged with wrongdoing, the Constitution itself rears about him that bulwark which entitles him to be heard in his defense and presumes his innocence until the contrary is shown. When an entire people is arraigned by any gentleman he certainly ought to be prepared with some evidence to justify what he says. And when a gentleman rises upon this floor as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] did and makes the assertion with respect to the people of Utah, that they are murderers, polygamists, thieves, vagabonds, and is not able to produce one syllable of evidence to justify his statements—when a man who lives 3,000 miles away from them, who is unwilling to accept the testimony of reputable people who live right there among them, unwilling to accept the testimony of the people of Idaho, of Wyoming, unwilling to accept the testimony of decent people who have been in Utah—when a gentleman takes that attitude and has the effrontery to get up here and make such a speech as did the gentleman from Massachusetts awhile ago, he ought to hang his head in shame. [Applause.] He is not worthy to represent a civilized people. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE. I would like to say to the gentleman that I have read the book entitled Brigham Young's Wife No. 15; and she ought to know. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Oh, I suppose you have read some fictitious and fanciful tale.

Mr. MORSE. Not fictitious at all. It is the book of Brigham Young's wife No. 15, and it tells what took place in the endowment house. I guess she knows what was going on there. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Where did you get "Wife No. 15?"

Mr. MORSE. It is a book which has had a circulation of 50,000 or 100,000 copies.

Mr. RAWLINS. Oh, my friend, I am not going back to discuss those questions with you. I am not going to deny that Brigham Young had ten wives, or thirteen wives, or fifteen wives.

Mr. MORSE. Then, do not accuse me of falsehood or tell me to hang my head in shame when my statements are truth and history. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. That is not the statement you made in your speech. The statement you made applied to the people living in Utah to-day. Brigham Young is dead; did you know that? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Did he have to go out of doors to die in the bosom of his family? [Laughter and confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I object to this proceeding. I raise a point of order upon it. Brigham Young was born in Vermont. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to proceed, I would like to do so for a few moments without interruption. A case was tried in Idaho about 1886 in which a large number of witnesses were called who testified that polygamy in that Territory as early as 1884 had been forbidden by the church. Testimony was given in a case in the spring of 1888 that in Utah the Mormon authorities had in reality forbidden the practice of polygamy or the contraction of polygamous marriages as far back as 1886, and that after that time the practice had not existed. In 1888 the Legislature of the Territory of Utah passed what is entitled "An act regulating marriages." It will be found in 2 Compiled Laws of Utah of 1888, page 92. The second section of that act provides that marriage is prohibited and declared void where there is a husband or wife living from whom the person marrying has not been divorced.

That declares polygamous marriages unlawful. The act provides for the issuing of licenses by the clerk of the court to persons proposing to be married. Such licenses can only be issued to persons who are known; or, in case the persons are unknown, they are required to make affidavits that their status entitles them to marriage, and a false affidavit is made perjury, punishable as such.

The act designates the persons who shall be authorized to solemnize marriages, and then it provides that any such person who knowingly solemnizes a marriage under conditions not authorized by the act shall be punishable by imprisonment not to exceed three years, and by a fine.

That is a law which in effect renders polygamy unlawful, and provides for the punishment of any person who practices it or who participates in the solemnization of a polygamous marriage, and that, be it remembered, is an act passed by the representatives of the people of Utah at that time.

In 1892 a statute was passed, to be found in the session laws of Utah for that year, the first section of which provides as follows:

> Every person who has a husband or wife living, who hereafter marries another, whether married or single, and any man who hereafter simultaneously or the same day marries more than one woman, is guilty of polygamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years. But this section shall not extend to any person by reason of any former marriage whose husband or wife by such marriage shall have been absent for five successive years and is not known to such person to be living and is believed by such person to be dead, nor to any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been dissolved by a valid decree of a competent court, or any person by reason of any former marriage which shall have been pronounced void by valid decree of a competent court on the ground of nullity of the marriage contract.

The next section provides the punishment for unlawful cohabitation of a man with any other than his lawful wife—makes it a misdemeanor. Those laws are to be continued in force under the provisions of the bill which is favorably reported by the Committee on Territories for the admission of Utah.

The final section provides that all laws in force in the Territory at the time of admission shall be continued in force under the State government.

I understand well enough that there is a sentiment among certain members of the House that there ought to be in the enabling act a provision that the constitution of the State shall make polygamy punishable as a crime. There is no substantial objection to that. In 1888 the people of the Territory of Utah proposed to insert such a provision in their constitution. The only objection that there is to it does not come from the Mormons or from the Mormon people. The Territory has enacted stringent laws for the suppression of polygamy. There are other provisions to which I might refer relating to the methods by which these laws shall be enforced.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he has any objection to the insertion in the enabling act of a clause prohibiting polygamy?

Mr. RAWLINS. None except what I shall state. I was proceeding to say——

Mr. POWERS. If you will assent to that, you can pass your bill before 5 o'clock this evening.

Mr. RAWLINS. I was going to make a suggestion on that subject. The provision which is proposed by the minority to be inserted in the constitution makes polygamy or dual marriage a felony and provides for its punishment; but it does not define the offense or make any exception. If that provision is inserted in the terms in which it is embodied in the minority report, it could not be in any manner changed or modified by the Territorial Legislature. It is not complete in its definition; it is inaccurate; it would work injustice; it would prevent the enactment of laws by the State which would tend more completely to suppress polygamy and to prevent its revival, if any such thing were supposed liable to happen.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRETZ. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] be allowed to continue his remarks until he has concluded.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAWLINS. I thank the gentleman and the House for their courtesy. I am sorry it has become necessary that I should occupy more than the time allowed under the rule.

(Mr. POWERS advanced to Mr. RAWLINS and showed him a proposed amendment.)

Mr. RAWLINS. I have no objection to that proposition. I was about to suggest that we might insert a clause providing that enactments of the Territorial Legislature for the punishment of polygamy and in relation to marriage should be continued in force: but I am entirely content with the proposition which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] suggests.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

Mr. POWERS. The amendment which I propose is to add after the word "worship" in the nineteenth line, page 4 (which is the clause prohibiting certain things) the following words:

Provided that polygamous marriages shall be forever prohibited.

I understand that the gentleman from Utah assents that this amendment may be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order now.

Mr. POWERS. I have suggested this provision for the reason that it occurs to me the amendment proposed by the minority of the committee is altogether too cumbersome; there is too much machinery about it.

The CHAIRMAN. At the proper time the amendment can be submitted.

Mr. RAWLINS resumed the floor.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Utah this question: Is it not a fact that the provisions of this bill, if adopted, will carry into effect the Territorial laws until the Territory becomes a State, which will effectually suppress polygamy until the Legislature can meet?

Mr. RAWLINS. The present enabling act as proposed contains a provision which I was about to read. This provision of the enabling act, as proposed by the committee, is that—

All laws in force made by said Territory at the time of its admission into the Union shall be in force in said State, except as modified and changed by this act or by the constitution of the State.

Now, the laws to which I have referred, enacted by the Territorial Legislature, will by the operation of this provision of the enabling act be continued in force under the State government. It is true that the Legislature of the State might if it saw fit repeal or modify those statutes, but polygamy would be unlawful. Polygamous marriages would be invalid, by force of these Territorial statutes upon the passage of this enabling act, without any provision in the constitution or in the enabling act other than what I have read providing against polygamy.

The objection which I have, as I have already stated, to the definition of the offense of polygamy in the constitution is that if that provision be adopted by Congress it will leave the matter in an unsatisfactory condition, for the reason that it will repeal, for instance, the statutes that I have read enacted by the Legislature of the Territory; because the definition of "polygamy," as contained in the amendment of the minority, is inconsistent with these statutes. It rather tends, in my judgment, to prevent the exercise of the full authority on the part of the State of powers to prevent any revival of this obnoxious practice, and we do not intend—the people of Utah do not intend, in my belief—that it shall be revived.

There is, I think, nobody in the Territory at this time who has any desire whatever to revive it. The leaders of the Mormon Church have solemnly professed and pledged their faith and honor and the faith and honor of the people—the entire people of the Mormon Church—that they will not revive this practice. They did it in the petition for amnesty addressed to the President, and all the leading Federal officials in the Territory joined in a statement that they believed these men were sincere in asking the President to exercise his clemency in their behalf in accordance with the petition.

There have been no Mormon polygamous marriages in Utah, so far as known, within the last eight or ten years, with few exceptions, and the public declaration of the Mormon Church is that there has been a discontinuance of the practice. The Legislature has enacted every law required for the prevention of the revival of the practice, and in view of these facts no provision is necessary, in my judgment, although I am willing to consent that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, which has been read, may be adopted.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does not the bill now before the House change the law as to the registration of voters; and if so, please state in what particulars?

Mr. RAWLINS. It only changes it to this extent: The same method of registration as now provided will prevail. Under the existing statute a man to be entitled to register or vote is required to take oath that he will not commit fornication, adultery, and various other crimes. It is an exceedingly obnoxious and offensive test to apply to any man.

It is an insult to any respectable citizen. Everybody, in fact, is now entitled to vote. If there are any polygamists there they are entitled to vote under the amnesty proclamation of the President; and to continue that obnoxious provision of the Edmunds-Tucker act would be of no use whatever to the people who desire to get rid of it, but would be a continuation of an offensive provision which they seek to have repealed. It is a sort of test oath of the most obnoxious character enacted by Congress to meet an extraordinary situation which has passed away, and we seek to eliminate it. That is the only effect of the change.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Do I understand the gentleman to state that its removal will actually make no difference in the registered vote of the population?

Mr. RAWLINS. Not at all.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont is put into the bill: could it be enforced without legislation on the part of the Legislature? In other words, would the constitution itself be a penal statute, the violation of which could be punished, without an act of the Legislature?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly not.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Therefore, any prohibition of that kind would be dependent on the State Legislature and its action afterwards?

Mr. RAWLINS. After all, no matter what you require to be inserted in the constitution respecting polygamy, you have got to depend on the sentiment of the people of the Territory of Utah to prevent the revival of the practice.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Just the same as any other State.

Mr. BOEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BOEN. I have heard it stated that the opposition to polygamy is more prevalent amongst the women than the men in Utah. Is that true?

Mr. RAWLINS. I have nothing on that question that would be of service to the House.

Upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], I would like to add this other answer, that his amendment would be irrevocable under the provisions of this enabling act without the consent of the United States and the people of said State.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. WASHINGTON. But is not the statement you made still true, that no matter what clause is put in the enabling act, in regard to the practice of polygamy, its enforcement must depend entirely upon the people in the end, upon the legislation enacted by the Legislature after the Territory shall become a State and the judges elected by the people of that State after it is a State? Is it not true that the enforcement of the law must depend entirely upon the judges and upon the sentiment of the people backing up the administration of the law?

Mr. RAWLINS. Oh, yes; it must depend upon the sentiment of the people.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And therefore this is unnecessary.

Mr. RAWLINS. My contention is that it is unnecessary. I am not going to admit the unfitness of the people I represent to be admitted into the Union by saying that it is necessary. If I believed that it were necessary, I am free to confess that I would not stand here advocating the admission of the Territory into the Union. It is not necessary. The sentiment out there contravenes it.

Now, the people of Utah have more at stake upon this question than gentlemen who represent other constituencies. I have traveled among those people, met them in every locality, discussed questions with them, civil and political. I know them as well as any man can know a people, because I have been with them all my life. I think I understand the sentiment which prevails among those who are uppermost in the councils of the political parties in the Territory, and who would likely dominate its affairs in case it be admitted as a State, and I am prepared to say upon my conscience that I believe those people can be safely intrusted with the full measure of self-government which would be accorded under statehood.

The people of the East are misinformed as to the character, the education, and the intelligence of the people of Utah. I have in mind more than a hundred young men, born and educated in that Territory, who would grace the administration of any State in this Union on account of their ability, their learning, and their integrity. You will never have occasion to regret this act. By the admission of the Territory of Utah I believe her people—240,000 in number to-day, and probably in three or four years, with statehood, 500,000—will send to these halls men who will not only do credit to the people they represent, but who will be of service in the affairs of this great nation.

For forty-three years I have lived under a Territorial form of government. I have longed for the conditions to come when those people could be admitted within the Union of the States and be permitted to participate in the affairs of the nation.

Generations have passed away under the Territorial form of government. Men who do not live under that form of government little know the disadvantages under which the people labor. Men are sent to them to rule over them who owe them no responsibility, and who little understand their character or their situation; and, however bad may be the conduct of these rulers, it is indeed difficult to make men 3,000 miles away understand or appreciate the situation. How little of self-government is possessed to-day by the people of Utah is disclosed in a memorial, the statements of which, as they are drafted by myself, I know to be accurate. I call attention to some of the statements contained in this memorial:

The governor, the secretary, the members of the judiciary, except justices of the peace, the marshal, the public prosecutor and his assistants, the board of commissioners, who appoint all registration and election officers and control the elections, are selected by a distant appointing power, and are utterly unaccountable to the people for the manner in which they perform the duties of their offices.

The governor nominates the auditor of public accounts, the treasurer, the governing boards of all public institutions, such as the university, agricultural college, reform school, and insane asylum. Thus the people have no voice in the selection of persons to manage the public fund and institutions created and maintained at their expense.

The Territorial school commissioner is selected by the supreme court, and owes no responsibility to the people.

Clerks selected by the district judges and the probate judges appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, select the regular panels for jurors. The regular panel is supplemented by persons summoned at the discretion of the United States marshal. The determination of rights of life, liberty, and property rests with tribunals, no part of which owe any accountability to those most vitally concerned in the faithful performance of their duties. The marshal and his deputies are clothed with the most far-reaching authority, under which they may usurp the functions of all the local constabulary and police of the Territory. Even the justices of the peace are shorn of their limited jurisdiction by commissioners appointed by the supreme court, and whose jurisdiction is made coextensive with that of such justices.

And so we might go on enumerating the different officers concerned in the administration of the Territorial government, which would disclose the fact that the 240,000 people living in the Territory of Utah have scarcely a vestige of the rights of self government.

Now, I am not going to detain gentlemen longer upon this question. Both of the national conventions, in their platforms, have declared in favor of the admission of the Territory. Both the parties in the Territory of Utah have declared for the same thing. There is no opposition from that source. Everybody most familiar with the facts believe that the time has arrived when the people of the Territory of Utah should be admitted into the Union.

As I stated before, I believe there is absolutely no peril, so far as any apprehension entertained by anybody on the subject of polygamy, that that practice will ever under any circumstances be revived in that Territory.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I have canvassed this bill, and I see in it large appropriations of land, amounting to something like 1,400,000 acres. I desire to ask whether Congress has heretofore, when a new State has been admitted, granted any such donation of land as that disclosed in this bill?

Mr. RAWLINS. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, because it enables me to state some facts upon that subject that will be of use to this House in voting upon this matter. There are, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] in the opening argument upon this question, 52,000,000 acres of land in the Territory of Utah. The land office in that Territory was established in 1867. From 1867 down to the present time there has been disposed of 6,000,000 acres of land. The total area of the Territory which has been surveyed is about 12,000,000 acres. The total, covered by grants for railroads and other purposes, of the surveyed and unsurveyed lands which have been appropriated amount to less than 22,000,000 acres of land, leaving 31,000,000 acres of land wholly unappropriated and undisposed of.

These lands have during the past thirty or forty years been offered by the Government of the United States to anybody who was willing to go upon them and appropriate them and pay for them at the rate of $1.25 per acre. The people of this country have been clamoring for lands, but the fact is that these lands are mountain or desert lands. Some of them are lands which might be useful if they could be irrigated; but there is no water supply. In the Territory of Utah lands are wholly useless without water. These unappropriated lands would not to-day sell for 10 cents an acre. The 6,000,000 acres of land which have been entered under the land laws were settled upon prior to the extension of the public surveys over those lands. Under the law where the settlement is made prior to the extension of survey and the settlement happens to be made upon a school subdivision, when it comes to the selection of the school lands, which only takes place upon the admission of the Territory into the Union, other lands must be selected.

If we take the 6,000,000 acres, very little of these lands is available for school purposes. If we take the 12,000,000 acres the same is also true. My friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] states that there is granted one-ninth of the 52,000,000 acres, which is about 6,000,000 acres for school purposes under the provisions of this act. Now, that is not true. The grant for school purposes only takes effect as to the surveyed land or as the lands are surveyed. One-ninth of 12,000,000 would 1,570,000 acres of the surveyed lands. That is all that could be available at present, and much of these lands is excluded because settled before their survey.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand you to say that if you take the relative values of the land proposed to be granted there to the lands granted to the other States, there is not much difference?

Mr. RAWLINS. It will give to Utah less in value than has been given to any State admitted into the Union of States. Objection has been made also that there is in this enabling act a grant of 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of lands through the land offices for school purposes of the Territory. There have been 6,000,000 acres, or about $1,400,000, derived for all the land disposed of during all of the past history of the Territory. If we get 10 per cent of all disposed of, that would only give $140,000. Under this act we get only 10 per cent of the lands that will be hereafter disposed of through the land offices: that is a mere bagatelle and can be stricken out of the bill with little or no detriment to Utah.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I see from the bill that sections No. 2, 16, 32, and 36 in each township are to be appropriated to the State; how many townships are there in Utah containing public lands? In other words, how many acres will the State get under this provision?

Mr. RAWLINS. The gentleman can figure that out. I dislike to detain the committee any longer upon this question.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I simply desired to get at that as a business proposition.

Mr. RAWLINS. Well, there are 31,000,000 acres of land undisposed of, which have been offered by the Government of the United States for thirty years past at $1.25 an acre, but nobody would take them. They are not worth 10 cents an acre, and if the school lands are to be selected out of those, the total grant made to the Territory by this act will amount to very little.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I would like to know the amount.

Mr. RAWLINS. Well, one-ninth of 50,000,000 is somewhat less than 6,000,000 acres.

Mr. PICKLER. You are to have four sections out of every township. The new States recently admitted got the sixteenth and the thirty-sixth sections, two sections out of thirty-six, but you are to get four sections out of thirty-six?

Mr. RAWLINS. That is it. But if you look at the substance of the thing——

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, I think you ought to have it. That land is not worth anything to anybody else.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Can the gentleman tell us how many incorporated cities there are in Utah?

Mr. RAWLINS. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. Formerly, under the general preemption law of the United States, lands within the corporate limits of a city were not subject to private entry. The cities in Utah covered large areas of land under the original acts of incorporation.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. How many of them are there?

Mr. RAWLINS. I can not tell you; but that provision of the statute has been corrected, and, by an act of Congress passed in 1877, only so much land is now excluded from entry in any city as is actually settled upon and used for town purposes.

All the other lands within the old original corporate limits have been entered and the titles have passed to individuals. There is no monopoly of land in Utah. The average size of farms there is 27 acres, according to the census returns. There are perhaps more people own their own homes in Utah than in any other State or Territory in the United States in proportion to population. You can not find a single individual there, as in California and elsewhere, holding thousands of acres of land. I do not know of a single man in Utah who holds to exceed 200 or 300 acres. There is no corporation or syndicate there controlling large blocks of land, except the Union Pacific Railroad, through the land grant made to it by the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that a change has taken place in Utah. How that change has been brought about may be interesting to gentlemen who are not familiar with its history. The making and the enforcement of laws by Congress has had something to do with it. There is no question about that. But there has also been developing for many years past in the Territory of Utah a sentiment among the people who have been born and brought up there, which has had a great deal to do with this change. The eradication or discontinuance of polygamy is perhaps due first to external pressure, but still more largely to the efforts of people within the Mormon Church itself to bring about the reform of the organization in that respect.

It should be borne in mind that but a very small proportion of the Mormon people have ever practiced polygamy. Those who did not practice it saw the evil consequences which flowed from its practice, the unhappiness which it caused in families, and that it rendered the people of Utah obnoxious to the prevailing sentiment of the age. Its practice disturbed the tranquillity, impeded the progress, retarded the growth, darkened the character, and destroyed the prosperity and happiness of the people.

Thousands of non-Mormons have come into Utah and made their homes there. Our schools are free; attendance is required; they are nonsectarian. Education has been freely disseminated. Under such conditions, polygamy having once been suppressed or extirpated, is not likely to be revived.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there has been any revelation on the subject of polygamy recently; or does the head of the church claim there has been?

Mr. RAWLINS. The Mormon people claim that their duty with reference to the practice of polygamy has been defined by a revelation. The present president of the Mormon Church on the 26th of September 1890, issued a manifesto in which he forbade the Mormon people from contracting marriages in violation of law. At a great conference of the Mormon people, ten or fifteen thousand being present, embracing all the various organizations of the church, it was moved that this declaration of the president of the church be regarded by the church as authoritative and binding; and that motion was unanimously adopted by the vote of that great congregation.

The elders of the Mormon Church got up and said that this came to the people with all the force of a revelation, and was binding upon them; and many of the Mormon people have testified in court when occasion has arisen when such testimony would be relevant; that they regard that as a revelation from Almighty God; that they no longer believe polygamy and its practice to be right; and in effect it is not only discontinued as a practice, but so far as the great mass of the Mormon people is concerned it is eradicated as a belief. But the people of Utah—I think I can speak for them on this question—mean, I believe, what they say. They are engaged in no scheme of fraud or treachery by which to deceive the nation. Having made this pledge and on this pledge asked this action by the American Congress, I think I can say for them that they will stand by it though the heavens fall.

Gentiles and Mormons associate so freely that you can not distinguish them. They act together in business transactions and in all the associations of life. You find them mingled in social circles, just as you find people intermingling elsewhere throughout the United States; and measuring man for man you can not tell one from the other. My friend from Tennessee, when he was recently out there, had an opportunity of meeting many of the people of all classes; they came to see him; and for the life of him he could not have pointed out which were Mormons and which Gentiles, although he might perhaps have been able to distinguish the Jews.

We have the most beautiful towns and cities upon the American continent; we have schools, school buildings, and school appliances; we have cultivated school teachers who would do credit to many of the old communities of this country. If there is any reason on earth why Utah should longer be kept out of the Union, I am unable to conceive it. I ask the vote of this House that Utah may be speedily admitted. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HARTER obtained the floor.

Several MEMBERS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. HARTER. If the House prefers to adjourn——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I wish to state that we are compelled to close this debate to-night, because we must finish the bill by half past 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DINGLEY. The debate can not be closed to-night.

Mr. HARTER. If it is the pleasure of the House to adjourn, I shall certainly not stand in the way. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think we can get through the bill to-morrow if we adjourn now. If we do, several gentleman will lose their opportunity to speak.

Mr. DINGLEY. There will be no trouble about getting the bill through to-morrow.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly accommodate myself to the circumstances and to the humor of the House; and by making my remarks brief, I will leave ample opportunity for those to speak who choose to follow me.

I am very well aware that the temper of this House will finally show itself by a vote in favor of the admission of Utah into the Union. Nevertheless, I do not hesitate to ask a little of the time of the House in order that I may present briefly, and I hope with reasonable clearness, my objections to the measure. They are not based upon the grounds which have been so far urged here to-day against the bill.

I recognize, as every man on this floor must recognize, in the specimen that Utah has sent here as her representative, that her manhood is fully upon a parity with the manhood of the States already in the Union. If there were only enough such men as the gentleman who now sits at my right [Mr. RAWLINS] located on the 52,000,000 acres of land he speaks of, I should not only not object to their admission, but should be the earnest advocate of bringing Utah into statehood.

I believe also that the average population of Utah is of a more than ordinarily high grade; and I do not exclude from this characterization even those men who heretofore have been polygamists. As a rule that population is industrious, economical, thrifty, and sober. And therefore it seems to me, in proportion to numbers, there are possibly few of the older States which can claim for themselves a population of greater enterprise, of more general intelligence, or one more thrifty, more energetic, more industrious, and therefore better fitted for the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship, than are the people of the Territory of Utah.

Nor, sir, do I object either to the peaceable condition of Utah. I believe life is just as safe within the borders of Utah as it is in the State of Ohio. I believe it is much safer than in many of the other States of the Union, and in many portions of the other States that have been in the Union ever since the Federal Constitution was adopted. Therefore, this is not the ground of my objection, for I believe also, there is less danger of anarchy or disorder in the State of Utah, if admitted, than in many of the larger States, and I doubt very much whether Utah would ever elect, if admitted as a State, a governor who would be as much in sympathy with anarchy and disorder as is the governor of one of the principal States of this Union. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POST. What State?

Mr. HARTER. I refer to the great State from which my esteemed colleague from Illinois comes. I am sure, sir, there will never be a governor of Utah elected who will propose to march to the Capital of the United States with the blood of those who disagree with him reaching to his bridle bits. I am not afraid of such a condition of things ever existing in Utah. Nor do I sympathize with the objection to her admission that some of the people there practice polygamy. I am not a polygamist myself [laughter] neither practically nor theoretically; but at the same time polygamy is not the objection or any part of the ground of my objection to the admission of Utah. I believe that there is no more polygamy practiced in Utah to a square mile than in Chicago, Boston, or Washington; and I say this, furthermore, that I do not believe in Utah there is one man who has ever had five wives contrary to the law where there are ten in Chicago who have had five or more contrary to the law of God. It does not become us to scandalize Utah or to object to its admission on this ground.

Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to object to the admission of Utah on such a ground as this, and if I came from Massachusetts I should be equally chary of objecting on this ground. [Laughter.] I will be very careful about objecting on any such grounds so long as Ohio and other States of the Union maintain on their statute books divorce laws which are an outrage on the men and women in the land and an insult to God himself; and since I come from a State disgraced by such laws I am not here on my feet to object to Utah coming into the Union because there are found people within her borders practicing polygamy. In fact, sir, if polygamy is to be practiced at all I prefer the community which practices it openly to one which practices it secretly and hypocritically. In other words, practically speaking, I would not draw much of a line of distinction between the polygamy of Utah and the monogamy of some of the older States. I repeat, therefore, that this is not the ground of my objection to the admission of Utah.

But, sir, on the other hand it seems to me that there are good grounds of objection. The admission of Utah as a State has objectionable features. This gentleman sitting on my right [Mr. RAWLINS] represents a Territory having 52,000,000 of acres of land and only 240,000 or 250,000 population, and he asks us to bring in this sparsely settled Territory as a State and plant it beside the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And Rhode Island and Delaware.

Mr. HARTER. Yes, Rhode Island and Delaware. But let me tell my friend they could not come into the Union now. They are entitled to wear the livery of States because they fought their way into the Union during the Revolutionary war.

I do not believe in bringing in any more States having a hopelessly insufficient population. It is not fair to the older States, nor does it give the people of the balance of the country a fair representation in the making of laws or in the election of their Chief Magistrate. I know it has been said that this is a party measure, that Utah will bring us two more Democratic United States Senators. [Laughter.] But this will not justify us, as Democrats, in voting for the admission of Utah. We have seen too much of that sort of partisan action on the part of the Republican party, and always condemned it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HARTER. Yes.

Mr. RAWLINS. What was the population of Ohio at the time she was admitted?

Mr. HARTER. I am glad the gentleman has asked me the question, and hope the House has heard it. He asks me the population of Ohio when she was admitted into the Union. I can not give him the exact population at this time——

Mr. RAWLINS. I will tell you, then. It was 50,000. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARTER. Well, gentlemen, as you applaud that sentiment I will wait with my remarks to give you a chance to do it again, because I want to use it for an exclamation point in my argument.

Mr. RAWLINS. What was the area?

Mr. HARTER. I do not remember accurately. I wish you would tell the House.

Mr. RAWLINS. Forty thousand square miles. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. Forty thousand square miles. What was the population of the American Union at that time? The gentleman puts into my mouth the argument I wish to use, and he simply helps carry out the theme upon which I have entered. I say that the proportion of the population of Ohio, when it was admitted into the Union, as compared with the total population of the States then in the Union, was more than four times as great as that of Utah to-day. When the population of Utah doubles, if I am here in the House, I shall vote for the admission of Utah to the Union.

Mr. RAWLINS. I suppose you would not give us any room to increase? Now, during the last three years we have added to our population as many people as existed in Ohio at the time of her admission.

Mr. HARTER. That is just what I do not want to do. I am proposing to give you time to increase before you come in. Your admission now, I say, would be unfair, because in the most important affairs of this Government it gives to a sparsely settled population an unreasonable vote and corresponding influence. I appeal to you gentlemen on the Republican side of this House. We have heard you talk much of unfair representation. I know you have not proven it, but the burden of your speeches has been that the Democratic party has opposed fair representation; that one man in the South perhaps has had a vote equivalent to two men in the Northern States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Four.

Mr. HARTER. See what will result in Utah if she is admitted. The people of that State will have two United States Senators, with just the same vote in the making of laws in the Senate of the United States as the State of New York. Yet New York has a population twenty times as great, and it is proposed to give to this population out there a representation equal to the State of New York. What does it mean? It simply means that by voting for the admission of Utah you vote to give to every citizen of Utah twenty times the power—in making the laws for the people of the United States, in passing upon some of the most important questions which ever came before the National Legislature—as you give to a citizen of the State of New York.

If this was the first case of this kind, the gravity of it would not be what it is to-day. But unfortunately it is not. Already you have in the Senate, at the other end of this Capitol, fourteen such votes; and you know how often they have been cast—I will not say maliciously—because far be it from me to impugn the motives of any Senator—but you know how often those votes have been cast in a way highly detrimental to the interests of the country at large.

Mr. KILGORE. According to your views.

Mr. HARTER. Yes; according to my views.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARTER. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to be interrupted without limit: but I do not know the temper of the House. I feel now that I am occupying more time than I should.

Mr. SIMPSON. The temper of the House is all right.

Mr. HARTER. The gentleman from Kansas can ask his question.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in reasoning upon this basis of representation by population, he means to infer that in the system of government under which we are acting our Senate was organized on the idea that it should be representative of population, or do the Senators represent States? Do they not represent States instead of population?

Mr. HARTER. Has the gentleman finished his question?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

Mr. HARTER. Then I will say the gentleman is quite right.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the gentleman's argument falls.

Mr. HARTER. But the gentleman from Kansas ought to be familiar with the circumstances under which this unfair system of representation in the Senate was granted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then it is the fault of the system of government, and not the fault of these people who live in Utah.

Mr. HARTER. I am willing to give the gentleman from Kansas all the time he wants.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. HARTER. The gentleman ought to remember the circumstances under which this very unfair principle was put into the Constitution of the United States. He ought to know that the States which demanded it stood in a very different position from Utah. They had rights which we of this day can not claim for Utah. The people of those States had shed their blood for the freedom of the country. They were then States capable of self-existence. As a matter of fact, they all had thoroughly organized governments, some of them so thoroughly organized that they were able to erect tariff walls high enough to prevent the productions of their sister States coming within their borders. They refused to come into the Union unless the rights which they then possessed were crystallized into the very unwise, unequal, and therefore unjust representation which we find in the Senate of the United States, where each State, large or small, has an equal voice.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think they never had a tariff of more than 10 per cent, though.

Mr. HARTER. Excuse me from dipping into the tariff question. We will get enough of that I am sure in the course of a week or two.

Mr. LOUD. How did they stand on the silver question? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. You asked me how they stood on silver. Some of them even discounted the wildest of your vagaries about silver, for they had money which was cheaper and meaner than even free silver would give us. I recommend you to read the history of Rhode Island in this connection.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] interrupted me; and I am glad he did, because it reminds me of his own delectable State. [Laughter.] I feel that we have already gone as far into the experiment of admitting States sparsely settled and wholly unentitled to statehood as we should go. I say let us digest, if we can digest, if the stomach of the Union is strong enough to digest, the infantile States we have admitted into the Union. Let us digest our dinner of new States before we go to supper at the same table. Let us, for instance, get through with such enlightened States as Kansas! Let us have Kansas thoroughly civilized before we undertake any more. [Laughter and applause.]

We remember the action of the Legislature of Kansas during its last session. We recall how they broke the doors down, how they called in the police, and had to call for the militia of the State to keep men from each other's throats, a time when an outsider was not safe within a hundred miles of Topeka without two accident policies and double life insurance. Recalling this to the memory of my friend [Mr. SIMPSON] I say, Mr. Chairman, it is time that we should call a halt in this careless, indiscriminate, reckless, and I fear, in the end, very serious comedy of admitting States into the Union while they are wholly unfit for admission.

The fact that we have already admitted States into the Union without being properly fitted for it is no argument that we should continue to do it. I know this is the argument used on this floor and by members in private conversation. They say that because we have taken in other Territories having an insufficient population that therefore we must admit every Territory upon whose vast and idle acres a small and scattered population lives. If, however, these gentlemen could but reverse the thing and bring us a proposition that we should take Utah into the Union and let Nevada go out, I think our vote would be nearly unanimous.

Mr. HARTMAN. How about Rhode Island?

Mr. HARTER. Rhode Island bought her place in the Union with her blood.

Mr. HARTMAN. And Delaware?

Mr. HARTER. And Delaware, too. Each fought for their places in the Union. No such appeal can be made for Utah.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Have you any statistics——

Mr. HARTER. You see my friend from Arizona expects his 6 by 7 Territory to come in next. [Laughter.] I am glad he has arisen as an object lesson. He shows that after the Mormon of Utah we are to have the Gila monsters of Arizona for fellow-citizens and lawmakers. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The gentleman will now submit to an interruption.

Mr. HARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I want to file this under the same principle of protest against the criticism made of the State of Illinois, by the gentleman for whom I have the greatest feeling of respect personally, when he comes here making an argument based on a naked assumption, based on the question of injury of people entitled to statehood. The whole is a protest against the Constitution of the United States. And then are we going to put it down that no State shall be admitted into the Union until it has as many people as the State of New York has? I ask you where are you going to put the line: and then I will ask you another question. You say Delaware and Rhode Island were admitted into the Union by virtue of the blood they shed for the country?

Mr. HARTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Have you any statistics by which you can show that? If that is the question, have you any means by which you can state the number of soldiers furnished by Rhode Island in the Revolutionary war?

Mr. HARTER. No.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Have you any statistics of how many men Utah furnished in the Mexican war and which shed the most blood in that cause? Did you have any of those facts?

Mr. HARTER. I rise to admit that I do not have at my finger ends all the statistics that may exist in the public library; but if the gentleman desires to present these statistics I will move an adjournment of the House so that he may bring them in to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But do not you think it affects your protest against the Constitution?

Mr. HARTER. I am perfectly consistent. I will gladly vote for the admission of Utah to the sisterhood of States when her population comes half as near, in proportion, as the population of my own State did (at the time of its admission) to the population of the Union. Instead of asking more of Utah than the Union asked of Ohio, I am really asking only half as much, and the gentleman stands in a poor light and puts himself in an ungracious position, which is very contrary to his nature, as all know who know him will admit, when he makes such declarations on the floor of this House.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HARTER. I am willing, but I do not wish to delay the House.

Mr. HARTMAN. A brief question. Are not the 260,000 people in the Territory of Utah entitled to as many rights as the 50,000 people in Ohio were entitled to when Ohio was admitted as a State?

Mr. HARTER. No, sir; not by any proper rule of proportion. Whenever the people of Utah are entitled to half as many rights, by any fair rule of arithmetical proportion, I shall be willing to grant them not half, but all the rights that the people of Ohio received.

Mr. SIMPSON. When did Ohio get a monopoly of rights in this country?

Mr. POWERS. On the 7th day of last November. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. My answer to the gentleman from Kansas is that Ohio never got, and to her honor she never desired, such a monopoly.

Mr. SIMPSON. It was generally understood that under the Republican national administrations she had a monopoly of the offices; she is the home of McKinley, who is the head and front of the tariff monopoly; and now, if she is going to take a monopoly of all the other rights, we may as well let her run the whole country. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. But if you do, the whole country will be well run, my good friend from——

Mr. SIMPSON. From Kansas.

Mr. HARTER. I was going to say my good friend from China, because I have discovered that the political views which my friend [Mr. SIMPSON] has so eloquently presented to this House from time to time are those which were entertained in China during the eleventh century. In fact, if the House will permit a little digression from the line of my argument, I will state that in reading the history of China with care I have discovered that the Populist idea of government pure and simple, as it is now held by a very intelligent and able fraction of the Representatives on the floor of this House, was understood and that it prevailed in China on two different occasions during the eleventh century; and it is further worthy of remark that upon both those occasions it brought China down to the verge of destruction, and, I may add, they have never tried a third dose of the same medicine. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I presume, if China——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. HARTER. I yield to the gentleman from China. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I presume that if China had followed up that enlightened policy she would not now be lacking civilization. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, talking about civilization, we shall probably soon have an experiment in civilization not far from my friend's district, perhaps within the boundaries of the district which he represents, for I notice that the governor of his State has just invited all the tramps of America to make their home in Kansas. [Laughter.] Now, I am so liberal that if Utah would only invite the tramps of the country, and by that means would swell her population until it reached a respectable proportion to the population of the Union, I should then be willing to vote to bring her in as a State. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Under the new tariff law the population of Kansas will be pretty large if that invitation should be accepted. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I apprehend that no danger to Kansas will result from that circular if the Ohio people will stay away from us. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTER. I am sorry to have to admit that a very large proportion of the political population of Kansas did go from Ohio originally, but the errors into which they have wandered only show how easily men can depart from early and correct teachings when they get far away from a mother's knee and hearthstone.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that Kansas produced one man who is well known to the whole country, John Brown, who scared the whole Democratic party and freed the Democratic slaves.

Mr. HARTER. I do not know exactly what John Brown has to do with this question. However, as "his soul goes marching on," he may interfere possibly and potentially, too, in every question of public policy.

Mr. BOEN. What has China to do with it?

Mr. HARTER. I am entirely conscious that owing to frequent interruptions and to the fact that I rose rather unexpectedly to speak, I have not made a very connected argument on this question; and there are still two or three things I wish to state which are worthy of consideration.

It is claimed that the people of Utah will prosper more, will grow more rapidly under a State government than they have been doing under Territorial government. This is a proposition entitled to investigation. It ought to be fairly considered. If this handful of people in Utah will be very much blessed by admission—if we can create for their benefit a kind of paradise—if we can give them the millenium far in advance of the time they would be likely to get it otherwise, by admitting them into the Union and in doing so deprive the State of New York and other States of their proportionate representation, it is a matter which ought to be considered.

But the question is how much of an advantage it is going to be to the people of Utah if their Territory should become a State of the Union. Although they seem to think that they would grow more rapidly in population under a State government, I say that the facts in regard to the new States which have been recently admitted, will not sustain this assumption. I ask you gentlemen, when you go home, to look at your Tribune Almanac, or some other reliable almanac—the World Almanac, for instance, or the United States census, which is possibly not quite so reliable as either of them—and you will discover that the seven States which have been last admitted to the Union have been growing in population more slowly since their admission than they did under a Territorial form of government.

I do not know why this is so unless possibly for the reason that government by the United States conduced more to their prosperity, gave them greater security and peace, than government by themselves. But whatever may be the reason, I say that the States to which I have referred, now represented at the other end of the Capitol by fourteen Senators—a representation out of all proportion to their population—have grown less rapidly since they came into the Union than they did while they were Territories. The population of these small States has not increased as much since their admission to statehood as the natural physical increase reasonably to be expected from those who live honorably in the married state.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman will recollect that they have been under Republican rule. That is the trouble.

Mr. LOUD. How can the census show what the gentleman says when a majority of these States have been admitted to the Union since the last census statistics were collected?

Mr. HARTER. Sometime ago—for a purpose which I can not distinctly recall at this moment, but something in connection with the interests of the silver States, compared with some of the older States of the Union—I carefully prepared a table intending to use it on the floor of the House; but not having occasion to do so I do not know where it is. That table, however, shows the facts as stated—I am familiar with these new States, but I was astonished beyond measure at the results that table revealed. Therefore, in admitting these people into the Union we are not conferring upon them any very great advantage; we are simply injuring ourselves beyond remedy without giving them any compensatory blessing.

I listened with interest to portions of the memorial which my friend from Utah read. I admit that the restrictions there recited upon the people of Utah are unreasonable. They show that the principle of "home rule" is not recognized as it ought to be with reference to this Territory. There is no reason why the governor of Utah should appoint those Territorial officers, or that the courts there, before which the citizens of Utah go for justice, should be constituted in the manner which the gentleman has shown. There is no reason now for such a state of things. But in undertaking to remedy this evil let us not bring about a greater one. The evil complained of can be easily removed. Let the gentleman draw up a bill, if he pleases, to correct the injustice, and we will pass it. He knows as well as I know the circumstances under which the unjust provisions found a place in the statutes. At that time Utah was a polygamous community, and such restrictions were deemed necessary.

Mr. PICKLER. Why, those provisions are applicable alike to all the Territories.

Mr. HARTER. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. PICKLER. I beg your pardon; that is the fact. Those provisions are simply the uniform law of all the Territories. I myself resided in a Territory for six or seven years, and I know that the people do not enjoy the right of governing themselves. I ask the gentleman in all candor whether he does not think it a hardship that an American citizen like the gentleman from Utah should live forty-three years in a Territory and be denied participation in government—be deprived of the ordinary rights of an American citizen?

Mr. HARTER. It has not been my privilege to live in a Territory forty-three years or forty-three days——

Mr. PICKLER. If you ever had lived there you would not be making this speech to-day.

Mr. HARTER. I think I would be making this very speech, but making it much stronger. But while I have not had the pleasure I would like to call his attention to the fact that there is no uniform law on this subject relating to the Territories.

Mr. PICKLER. Indeed there is. I make this as a statement of fact. By a law applicable to all the Territories the President appoints the governor and these other officers.

Mr. HARTER. If the gentleman will collect the facts and present them to the House, I will acknowledge the correctness of his statement.

Mr. PICKLER. I have correctly stated the law.

Mr. HARTER. I believe the gentleman is mistaken; I feel quite sure he is.

The gentleman asked me also whether I think it not too much of a hardship for a man to live in a Territory for awhile? I answer him no, I do not; and if that kind of life develops men like this gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. RAWLINS], I consider it a good argument for relegating many existing States to Territorial government. Another thing, the hardships of a Territorial life are not so very great. Here we live in the District of Columbia, which has a Territorial government.

And yet I find gentlemen very anxious to get here, crazy to break into the territory of the District of Columbia, and when they get here they are usually anxious to remain eternally. So that can not be much of an objection.

Mr. FLYNN. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. HARTER. I am always glad to hear from the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FLYNN. Out of the appointments made in Oklahoma, forty-two are carpetbaggers sent in from the outside. Does the gentleman approve of that?

Mr. SIMPSON. From Ohio most of them, too, are they not?

Mr. FLYNN. No, sir; from Georgia. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARTER. The gentleman need not "shake his gory locks at me: thou canst not say that I did it." I tried to help give you a first-class governor; but the President occasionally makes a mistake, for which he should be readily excused, for we know that he is only human and not infallible. And I would say further to the gentleman that we should await the final returns from these "carpetbagger" appointments, as he calls them. They can not be worse, and they may be vastly better, than some of the incumbents that we have had in the past. After these carpetbaggers make a record, and it is as bad or worse than that of their predecessors, we will help him guillotine a few of them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: How does he reconcile it with a common sense of justice that his State of Ohio, with the number of people she has representing that State on this floor, should undertake to keep out of the House of Representatives the 250,000 people in the Territory of Utah? I ask, how can you say that it is just? Should you not, in other words, reducing the argument to its proper conclusions, say that every State ought to have its representation reduced proportionately here; or else amend the Constitution and provide for a greater number of Senators, and according to population instead of by States? Is it fair to leave Utah unrepresented, while Ohio is so liberally provided for?

Mr. HARTER. That is a fair question, and I shall endeavor to answer it in the same fair spirit. I think I have already stated that it seemed to me the Constitution is entirely wrong on this question, and I think it is the concensus of American opinion as well as that of every expert student of a constitutional government, whether he lives in America or elsewhere, that this is an unfortunate feature in our Government. But I have already explained the origin of it, and under the circumstances the wisdom of the creation of this unjust principle in the Constitution I am not here to defend. At the same time the gentleman introduces into his question a suggestion about the State of Ohio; whether we are proposing to do as justly by Utah as we do by Ohio in the matter of representation.

I have used New York, as a matter of courtesy, for an illustration, holding Ohio back as a matter of humility, and because it is well enough occasionally for a man from Ohio to exhibit a becoming modesty about his great State. But if the gentleman forces me to bring Ohio in I will say that if we admit Utah to the performance of the most important legislation which will occupy the attention of the United States Senate for years and years to come; if we admit Utah now to the election of Presidents of the United States, who control the Executive Departments of the Government, who appoint all the judges and control our diplomatic relations with the balance of the world, then by this act we would give to any one man residing in the State of Utah fifteen times the amount of representation that the citizen of Ohio has.

Mr. HARTMAN. Would you object to admitting Utah if they would vote with you?

Mr. SIMPSON. That would be an inducement for them to remove from Ohio, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would like to ask the gentleman how he makes that calculation—on what basis?

Mr. HARTER. Why, you would give the two Senators from the little State of Utah the same power that the great State of Ohio exercises in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But I understood the gentleman to refer to the Presidential election.

Mr. HARTER. The gentleman is quite correct. When I applied the proportion of representation to the election of the Chief Magistrate it was erroneous, unless the election was thrown into the House. I am obliged to him for correcting me. I intended particularly to refer to the power of the State in the Senate and as applied to the making of laws which our Presidents must execute, and the proportion I stated is correct, as the gentleman will find if he takes the pencil I have given him and a piece of paper and figures it out. In Ohio we have a population of about 3,750,000.

In Utah they have a population which is claimed—and I believe it to be correct—of about 240,000. I am sure these gentlemen who knock at the door of the Union would not be guilty of misrepresentation. Giving them, therefore, all they claim, a man residing in Utah would have about fifteen times as much power in making laws for the balance of the country as he would have if he lived in Ohio.

Now all this is unjust, it is all wrong, it is unnecessary; and looking forward some distance, you can see that it is also very dangerous.

Mr. BOEN. May I ask who is to be endangered by it?

Mr. HARTER. The whole country. Gentlemen of the extreme West, surely you now have a representation ample to the fullest extent. You have indeed a representation so far in excess of any other section of the country in the making of laws and in the election of the President, that it seems to me instead of asking more, you should, with proper modesty and with a reasonable respect for the rights of the people who are not fortunate enough to live in these far Western Territories, of your own accord say that you are content to wait for a more fitting time, and until you have gained larger proportions in population, proportions which will reasonably entitle you to membership in the sisterhood of States.

Mr. Chairman, I am much obliged to the House for the time accorded me.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. HAINES, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of the heirs of Casparus Coneyn, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. SMITH of Illinois, for this day, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

Whether such person has been accredited to the President of the Executive and Advisory Council of the Hawaiian Islands; and

Whether any person has accepted, or undertaken to accept, the office of a commissioner or public minister with the power aforesaid, or any of them, or has undertaken in any correspondence with the Government of Hawaii, or with any private person, to describe himself as commissioner of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. I do not see the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his seat. As I understood from him yesterday, he is called away to-day by a social engagement of some importance and interest, and he then repeated his assent to an agreement that we had yesterday that this matter should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I understood that it had been referred yesterday, but I see that was not the case. I was not in the Chamber. But as that is the understanding, I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will pardon me; it was postponed until this morning, because I desired to make a few remarks in relation to the resolution before it was referred to the committee.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator understood the general agreement?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. I have no objection, of course, and I withhold the motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is debatable. The Senator can make it or withhold it.

Mr. GRAY. I withhold it for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I do not take the floor for the purpose of discussing the Hawaiian question. It seems to me that we are not in a proper preparation for such discussion; that for an intelligent one it is absolutely necessary there shall be a thorough and complete investigation of the facts and a report made to this body. I am hoping that the Committee on Foreign Relations will make such investigation, and that after that is done I shall have an opportunity to address myself to the Senate on the general subject.

In the discussion that took place day before yesterday the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] made use of the following language:

He—

Referring to Mr. Bayard—

He merely gives voice to what rises naturally in his patriotic heart, as it would rise naturally, I believe, in the patriotic heart of every American, that when the flag of the country has been used for the purposes of dishonor, and when the authority and power and prestige of the United States have been made to cover an act of piracy that the wrong should in some way at some time and some how be rectified.

I am informed (I did not hear it, because I have been necessarily absent through most of the discussion on Hawaiian matters, engaged on a committee of conference) that one or two other Senators have made somewhat similar statements.

Now, what is there to be inferred from the declaration of the Senator from Delaware? Nothing under the sun except that our former minister at Hawaii dishonored the flag of his country and undertook to commit an act of piracy. From what sources can any Senator derive any information which authorizes him, or which he thinks authorizes him, to make any such declaration? Merely from one only, from Mr. Blount's report, for before the Senators there is to-day nothing other than that.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I rose not to interrupt the Senator, except so far as it may be necessary to correct him as to the ground of the criticism I made upon the conduct of affairs in the Sandwich Islands last January. What I said was not founded wholly or in large part upon any alleged report of Mr. Blount, but it was founded largely upon the documents that were communicated to us by the President in February last, when a treaty of annexation was sent to us for our action. It was a part of the document accompanying the message of the President of the United States in February of last year, upon the letter of Capt. Wiltse, and upon the letter and correspondence of Mr. Stevens himself largely, that I made such criticism as I did upon that matter.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see how the Senator could have arrived at any such conclusion from the papers to which he refers. I notice that President Harrison said—it was brought to my attention by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]—on page 1 of Executive Document No. 76:

The overthrow of the monarchy was not in any way promoted by this Government, but had its origin in what seems to have been a reactionary and revolutionary policy on the part of Queen Lilliuokalani, which put in serious peril not only the large and preponderating interests of the United States in the islands, but all foreign interests, and indeed the decent administration of civil affairs and the peace of the islands.

That was written, as a matter of course, after he had read all the messages and communications from Mr. Stevens.

Mr. GRAY. But if the Senator will allow me—I do not wish to interrupt him—I did not refer to the message of the President, but to the documents which accompanied the message; that was all. I do not wish to detain the Senate now by going over them. There are quite a number of them. I merely wish to make this general statement.

Mr. FRYE. But the message of the President was, of course, founded upon the documents to which the Senator refers.

Now, I do not know how far Blount's report is before the Senate. I do know it is before the country and before the House of Representatives in its entirety, and I do not see that there is or ought to be any delicacy about a reference to it.

I wish to say, in relation to that report, that in my judgment it is a most dangerous one on which any United States Senator can afford to make a serious attack upon the character of any private citizen of the United States. I affirm without hesitation that Mr. Blount in that report has not written one single unvarnished line of truth, nor given one unprejudiced opinion, nor rendered one impartial judgment.

Mr. President, I assume that this is an attack upon our former minister, Mr. Stevens, that he has dishonored the flag, that he has committed an act of piracy. Mr. Stevens was born in the State of Maine something over seventy years ago. For more than forty years he has been a prominent figure in our State. For more than forty years I have been intimately acquainted with him. For more than forty years the public eye of Maine has necessarily rested upon him. He has been during that period many times a member of both of our legislative bodies.

For many years he was the editor of the Kennebec Journal, our State paper, formerly edited for awhile by our late Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine. For more than thirteen years he has represented the United States Government as a minister abroad, at Paraguay and Uruguay, at Sweden, and in the Hawaiian Islands. He made international law a careful study, and for the understanding of it he was prepared by a thorough education in early life. He was familiar with all the usages and requirements of diplomacy. He was an antislavery Whig, and when the Republican party was born he necessarily united his fortunes to that party; and from that day to this he has been an earnest, zealous advocate of the principles of that party with his pen and on the stump. Indeed, I know of no man who has had more to do with the affairs of Maine publicly in the same length of time than Mr. Stevens. He is a man whose moral character is without a stain. He is slow to make up his judgments and zealous in maintaining them when made up. He is remarkable for his accuracy of statement, a characteristic, I suppose, acquired largely as an editor; and when Mr. Stevens makes a statement you can not make any one in Maine believe that it ought to be received with any grains of allowance whatever.

Such a man as this, who in his whole life up to this time and this hour never has had even a suspicion of wrong aroused against him, never has had an accusation made against him, is in the United States Senate, for some necessity or other, made the target of abuse and assailed as dishonoring the flag and as guilty of an act of piracy!

The President of the United States could and did, in spite of Constitution and law, make Mr. Blount paramount to Mr. Stevens in the Hawaiian Islands, but in intelligence, in education, in experience with affairs, in knowledge of international law, in familiarity with the usages and the requirements of diplomacy, in devotion to the interests and honor of his country, in fidelity to our Christian civilization, Mr. Stevens is paramount to Mr. Blount, and no President, not even Mr. Cleveland with all his power, can reverse that condition.

Mr. Stevens dishonor the flag! I propose to read what Mr. Stevens himself said to his neighbors, gathered around him at Augusta on his return from Hawaii, touching the dishonoring of the flag:

The raising of the United States flag over the Government buildings took place two weeks later—

That is, the 1st of February, two weeks after the revolution—and on that transaction there is some misapprehension which it is proper for me to correct. You may be assured it was not hastily nor thoughtlessly done. It was done with all the serious sense of responsibility that the United States minister and Capt. Wiltse could command. And here I may pay a fitting tribute to Capt. Wiltse and drop a tear over his honored grave. He is no more on earth to speak for himself, and I can justly defend him against any implications on his intelligence or his honor. Forty years in the naval service, a brave officer in the war when shot and shell did their work of death among those who stood in defense of the nation's life, he loved the flag of his country with the devotion which the Christians of the early centuries had for the cross. In his breast beat as loyal a heart as ever throbbed with human life. At home he belonged to one of the two great political parties, and myself belonged to the other. But abroad we knew no party but our country—no duty but that of American representatives. Capt. Wiltse and the American minister were in complete accord in raising the flag, February 1. He knew the situation thoroughly. The Provisional Government made the request that it be done, and these were its reasons: It had been created only two weeks before. There were no trained troops on the islands available for its use. Many of the men in official places on the different islands, selected under the monarchy from palace favorites, had not been removed and their future conduct was uncertain.

Men from business circles and from stores, banks, offices, and workshops had been on guard day and night for two weeks. There had not been time to create an efficient police, nor to organize and drill a small military force. In a city of 24,000 people of various nationalities it was reasonable to suppose there might be some elements of disorder. On the plantations not far off and in the city itself were believed to be many Japanese who had served in their own army before they came to Hawaii. It was feared that the fallen

Queen and the lottery and opium ring around her would obtain the assistance of the Japanese and other foreigners to restore her to the throne, she compensating them by granting them the right of suffrage and other favors, which the Queen in her desperation readily would have promised to grant. Fear and panic began to gain headway in the city. A riot was feared. Millions of American property and life and order were in peril. In these circumstances the only sure hope of safety was in the American naval force at hand. Should the American representative run the risk of anarchy and bloodshed when it was certain he would be held rigidly responsible if catastrophe and calamity should come? It was this pressure of necessity which compelled the American representative to act with promptness and vigor.

These were the reasons which led the Provisional Government to ask our assistance, and these reasons are known to the American public. But there were other potential reasons which pressed upon me. For nearly half a century our Government had claimed rights and interests in the Hawaiian islands superior to any other foreign nations. Repeatedly there have been attempts to induce our Government to agree to dual or tripartite responsibilities at Honolulu. John M. Clayton, Secretary under President Taylor, repelled this forty-three years ago, and such has been our policy since. It was well known to me that this idea of joint action had not been given up, but was still insisted on by one, if not two foreign representatives at Honolulu. There was one Japanese war vessel in the harbor, and another powerful ironclad—larger than the Boston—had been telegraphed for. I knew the English war ship was soon expected. I had reason to think, and the Provisional Government had reason to fear, that these foreign representatives would insist on the same right to land their naval forces which we had exercised. We were five thousand miles from Washington, with no cable from Honolulu to San Francisco, and the long space between mail steamers would not permit communicating with our Government and our receiving an answer in less than three weeks.

We knew not then that Ashmead Bartlett, in the English House of Commons, had asked the Gladstone Ministry whas it had done or would do relative to English interests at Honolulu, and that Lord Grey in behalf of the English ministry had answered that it would trust the American Government to protect English life and property in Hawaii. We did know that the attitude of the English minister at Honolulu was quite otherwise from this—that he still wished to have joint responsibility with the American minister as to the landing of troops and the maintenance of public order at Honolulu. I was therefore compelled to decide whether I would risk the danger of a practical abandonment of the long-maintained American policy of nonjoint responsibility in Hawaiian affairs. To thus surrender in practice what we had long claimed I knew well would prove me unfit to be an American representative. Here were difficulties which could be effectively and conclusively overcome only in one way; that was by raising the flag over the Government building as a symbol of our superior right to protect the Hawaiian Government. This would not only prevent all the danger of riot and bloodshed, but would shut out the landing of any other naval force except our own. Capt. Wiltse saw this as soon and as clearly as I did. With an American heart loyal to the core, conscientious, firm, self-possessed fully aware of the grave responsibility of the act, he was prompt to do his duty. The officers under his command were as intelligent and loyal as their own veteran commander. The following are the words read by Lieut. Rush of the Boston, on the steps of the government building simultaneously with raising the flag, which was immediately published by posters and in the newspapers;

"TO THE HAWAIIAN PEOPLE.

"At the request of the Provisional Government of the Hawaiian Islands I hereby, in the name of the United States of America, assume protection of the Hawaiian Islands for the protection of life and property and occupation of public buildings and Hawaiian soil, so far as may be necessary for the purpose specified, but not interfering with the administration of public affairs by the Provisional Government.

"This action is taken pending and subject to negotiations at Washington.

"JOHN L. STEVENS,
"Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.
"UNITED STATES LEGATION, February 1, 1893.
"Approved and executed by
"G. C. WILTSE,
"Captain, United States Navy,
"Commanding the United States ship Boston."

It will be observed that the plain intent of this little document is noninterference with the sovereignty of Hawaii—that it claimed to establish only a qualified and limited protectorate, and instead of infringing on the sovereignty of the country, it was a response to the only government of the islands to aid in maintaining its own sovereignty. The salutary effect of thus raising the flag was immediate and remarkable. Quiet, confidence, perfect order at once took the place of panic, fear, and distrust. Language can not adequately express the joyful feelings of the large American colony and of all the better elements of the other nationalities. All save a few sympathizers with our national rivals looked on the American flag floating in those genial skies with profound respect. None more so than many of the native Hawaiians.

It has been said that President Harrison and Secretary Foster disapproved of our action. I have never so understood it. Secretary Foster after our action was taken did carefully define just how far the effect of our qualified protectorate and flag raising should go, and his definition and instruction on the subject was just what the Provisional Government and the American representative intended when the flag was raised, and just what the Provisional Government and the American representative thought and intended that our published document and official action expressed.

The one essential and effective step we took was to raise the flag—we only did that, and precisely that President Harrison and Secretary Foster never disapproved. It remained up seventy-five days. During that time all had been accomplished which had been promised and expected when it was raised. In that time two foreign war ships had arrived at Honolulu, but the American flag was up, and thus all danger of dual or tripartite arrangement as to Hawaiian affairs was avoided, and the just American predominance successfully maintained. They are dull statesmen and poorly equipped diplomatists who do not know the advantage which the party has who is in actual possession. I am but too glad to believe that the present Administration has no thought of giving up this vantage ground, to which the bold and vigorous dispatch of Secretary Bayard, approved by President Cleveland, to Minister Merrill, July 12, 1887, powerfully contributed.

The language of the dispatch, when an outbreak was feared in the summer of 1887, was the following:

"The interests of American citizens which have grown up under the extension of commerce between Hawaii and the United States and the guaranties of existing treaty must not be jeopardized by internal confusion in the government of these islands, and it is the duty of the United States to see that these interests are not imperiled or injured, and to do all things necessary for their just protection.

* * * * * * *

"While we abstain from interfering with the domestic affairs of Hawaii, in accordance with the policy and practice of this Government, yet obstruction to the channels of legitimate commerce under existing law must not be allowed, and American citizens in Hawaii must be protected in their persons and property by the representatives of their country's law and power, and no internal discord must be suffered to impair them."

These were the latest instructions to the United States minister at Honolulu, on file at the legation, for guidance in case of circumstances precisely like these which arose when the Hawaiian monarchy fell in January last. It was the language of this dispatch which Capt. Wiltse of the Boston had for his instruction.

The essential objects to be accomplished by raising the flag were gained during the seventy-five days its bright, starry folds were before the people of Hawaii. The Provisional Government had secured the necessary time to organize an efficient police and military force, to substitute reliable officials in place of the unreliable, and to consolidate the new Government, with the approval of the best and responsible men of all the islands. That country now has the best Government it has ever had, administered by men of intelligence, education, and character, and as thoroughly American in sympathy and in interest as we have at the head of any of our American States and Territories.

So much for the charge of dishonoring the flag. I thank Heaven that no citizen of Maine ordered it hauled down, and I compliment the admiral who did that in his dispatch he says:

I do it in obedience to the orders of Commissioner Blount.

I have no doubt that it may become necessary to drag Minister Stevens down. I have had reliable information since I came into the Senate this morning which says that—

The purpose of the Administration is to charge that Stevens was a party to corruption, employed to drag down the Queen's government and establish the revolutionary government.

That does not amaze me.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator read that again?

Mr. FRYE. It reads:

The purpose of the Administration is to charge that Stevens was a party to corruption, employed to drag down the Queen's government and establish the revolutionary government.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, does the Senator make that charge?

Mr. FRYE. I say I am informed upon what I regard as reliable authority that that is the purpose. That is what I said. I did not make the charge myself.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator give his authority, or is he not at liberty to do so?

Mr. FRYE. I am not at liberty to give the authority. I will say for myself that I am fully prepared to see any method resorted to to drag Mr. Stevens down. I will say that for myself.

Whether money was or was not expended by the revolutionists I do not know, but as to any charge that Mr. Stevens, our minister, had any participation in corrupt practices to remove one government and create another, I feel able to say I do know that there is not one word of truth in it, and it would require an immense amount of evidence infinitely better than any that has yet been sent from Hawaii to the Secretary of State, to convince the people of Maine that such a charge can be sustained.

As to the piracy, I wish to put in the RECORD in reference to that a statement of our late minister, Mr. Stevens, prepared with great care. I regard it as important that it shall be in the RECORD, so that in future discussions we may have his statements to which reference may be made. Mr. Stevens says:

A deep sense of obligation to my country and an American's duty to defend an insulted, threatened, and struggling American colony, planted as righteously and firmly on the North Pacific isles as our Pilgrim Fathers established themselves on Plymouth Rock, demand that I shall make an answer to the astounding misrepresentations and untruths of Commissioner Blount's report on Hawaiian affairs, a copy of which I first obtained, with difficulty, Saturday evening, November 25. It is proper for me to preface my answer by briefly alluding to the fact, that those familiar with international rules and proceedings, and have had diplomatic experience, must be astonished that Secretary Gresham and his commissioner should make, before the world, such a persistent effort to discredit the recent agents of the Department they now represent, and which was once represented by Thomas Jefferson, William L. Marcy, William H. Seward, and James G. Blaine. The general adoption of such a policy by our Department of foreign affairs could not fail to weaken greatly our influence with foreign countries in any future effort, and serve to make the American diplomatic service contemptible in the eyes of the world. Not only is the course of Gresham and Blount extremely un-American in its form and spirit, but it is also in direct opposition to the civilizing and Christianizing influence on the Hawaiian Islands, while it is playing into British hands, in direct opposition to the efforts of the American Board of Missions, and to the American Government, for more than sixty years, in all of which period there has been a uniform, continuous, and patriotic American policy.

I may also make a preliminary remark regarding the repeatedly asserted opinion of those who have assailed my official action, that I was prepared for and stimulated to it by the accomplished and thoroughly American statesman who occupied the Department of State most of the period of President Harrison's Administration. It is sufficient to say that this expressed surmise is utterly without foundation. What I know and state on this point accords with what ex-Secretary Tracey has recently asserted in that regard. Still more, I may properly add, that the lines of official duty as followed by myself and Capt. Wiltse, and the course of the Administration and of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, in the critical Hawaiian days of January and February last, were exactly on the lines marked out by Secretary Marcy in 1854 and by Secretary Bayard in his dispatch to Minister Merrill July 12, 1887. Marcy's instructions and draft of treaty provided for annexation. Bayard's instructions of 1887 held the United States minister and naval commander at Honolulu responsible for the protection of American life and property and the "preservation of public order."

So much as a necessary introduction to my consideration of Blount's report. Not wishing to be severe on a neophyte in diplomacy, with little knowledge of the world's affairs outside of his own country; sent on a very peculiar errand amid currents and islands entirely unknown to him, he has been partly the victim of [illegible]ces, having been caught in the meshes and snares adroitly prepared for him by the cunning advisers of the fallen Liliuokalani, and by the shrewd, sharp, long experienced British diplomatic agent, whose aims and hopes Blount has served so well, and without the least suspicion that he was aiding ultra-British interests, even more than he was helping the Hawaiian monarchists and the justly dethroned queen.

It is clear enough from Blount's manner on the day of his arrival at Honolulu, as well as by his letter to the Department of State written shortly after, that he designed, at whatever cost, to repudiate the views and action of the recently terminated Administration, and that in order to do so he must impugn the action of Minister Stevens and of the commander of the United States ship Boston. A total stranger, it was impossible for Mr. Blount to know how unfitting it was for him to take up his quarters where he was certain to be surrounded by royalists, and where the supporters of the Provisional Government would be reluctant to go.

The hotel was kept by one who had served as Kalakaua's chamberlain, who was one of the principal persons in a syndicate that had cheated the Hawaiian Government out of nearly $100,000, a transaction which Minister Merrill had officially reported to Secretary Bayard, and this man was the leading member of a firm that sought to do its chief business with England, a thoroughly unprincipled opponent of the Provisional Government and of American predominance in the islands. He employed as his active assistant in managing the hotel a highly educated Englishman, of disreputable character, who had written in the Hawaiian British newspaper, under anonymous signature, articles abusive of the United States and grossly falsifying our Government's treatment of the Indians. This man had had a most unsavory record while residing in the United States, and has been a bitter assailant of American officials in American newspapers—in the paid service of the fallen Queen he has written whatever she and her immoral favorite, Wilson, have asked him to write. Residing at that hotel, Mr. Blount was under the constant espionage of the palace adventurers.

As a precautionary safeguard against thus shutting out the Americans from ready access to Commissioner Blount, a wealthy and a highly respectable widow lady, of the American colony, was ready to grant the use of her house to Mr. and Mrs. Blount, the commissioner to pay the same amount it would cost him to live at the royalists' Hotel. This private house was situated near the United States Legation, in the quarter of the city where annexationists and royalists could have unobstructed access to the commissioner, and where he could conveniently avail himself of the legation records. This polite offer of an American residence to an American commissioner did not originate with the Provisional Government, nor did the Provisional Government have anything whatever to do with the proposed arrangement. A committee of three American citizens, born and educated in the United States, the superiors of Mr. Blount in education and manners, men who had not taken part in the revolutionary proceedings of the previous weeks, went on board the Rush when that vessel came into the harbor, while I was courteously meeting Mr. and Mrs. Blount on their arrival.

At the request of the three American gentlemen, I introduced them to Mr. Blount. His manner of receiving their visit repelled them, and they asked me to state the reasons why it would be pleasant to him, and better for all concerned, not to go to the royalists' hotel, but to take residence on neutral ground, where he would be master of his own surroundings. As delicately as I could do so, I stated the offer of the committee of his countrymen, pointing out to him that by accepting their proposition he would be near the archives of the legation, which he could conveniently use, which I would be pleased at once to place at his disposal. Brusquely, not to say insultingly, he refused the courteous and honestly intended offer of his countrymen, and at once placed himself amid royalists and ultra-British surroundings, the British legation being near this royalists' hotel, at which the British minister soon took residence and living.

The effort in his report to cast imputation on the Provisional Government and myself as to the offer of the American house to an American commissioner will be estimated at its true value by the American public. Commissioner Blount's manner toward me in the following weeks I would not allude to here were it not absolutely necessary to do so. It is well known to all who have knowledge of diplomatic rules and customs that when a new diplomatic agent arrives at the capital to whose government he is accredited, his predecessor and the occupant of the legation should receive him courteously, proffer his services to his successor, inform him of the existing state of affairs, and, as soon as convenient, give him access to the legation archives. This I did promptly, and had he availed himself of the kind offer of his countrymen as to residence, he could have occupied the room at the legation containing the official records, which I was ready to offer him. He coldly repelled my kindly intentioned offers, did not allow me to show to him the customary forms of introducing him to the foreign diplomatic officials and to the chief public men of Honolulu. How much of his singular course in these regards was due to want of knowledge, and how much to his already matured purpose to make out a case against the United States minister, the naval commander, and the Provisional Government, the American public must judge.

All insinuations and implications in Blount's report that I was averse to his access to the legation records is a shameless perversion of facts. To show the character of the men into whose environment he so quickly placed himself, I took to him the printed dispatches of Minister Merrill to Secretary Bayard, the printed records of the recently adjourned legislature, containing the recorded votes for and against the lottery gang, the recorded votes as to the recent changes of ministers, the official copy of the lottery charter, evidence of decisive value, if he had really come to Honolulu for any other purpose than to convict Harrison's Administration and the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee of hasty and ill-advised action in January and February last.

His manner while allowing me to leave these important documents in his room showed that he cared not to receive them, and the general drift of his report indicates that he did not even read them. Ignoring his inferiority of official rank, which, according to established rules the world over, was below that of minister resident, between a consul-general and chargé d'affaires, with the utmost effort of will controlling my outraged sensibilities, while suffering a terrible affliction at the recent sad drowning of a gifted and beloved daughter, I endured this insolent treatment, after thirteen years of service as United States minister, without a stain ever before attempted to be made on my official honor or my fidelity to American prestige and to American interests, never during my seventy-three years of life having lifted my voice, my hand, or my rifle against the flag of this American Republic. The charges, implications, and insinuations of Commissioner Blount against President Dole, Minister Thurston, and the other chief men of the Provisional Government are as baseless and unjust as those against myself and Capt. Wiltse, now sleeping in his honored grave.

But it is well for me to be more specific in meeting our opponent's recklessly partisan and ex-parte statements and arguments. Under the date of April 21, he says he disapproved of a request of the Provisional Government, that the American forces be landed for drill. I here affirm that the Provisional Government never made such a request. The Provisional Government followed the exact course followed under the monarchy. Whenever the naval commander desired to drill his men on shore, in accordance with naval regulations, he so signified to the United States minister, who made the request of the Hawaiian Government through the minister of foreign affairs. To my knowledge, at the period of which Blount speaks, the Provisional Government preferred that the American sailors and marines should not land for drill, because of possibilities of ill-feeling and broil between men of other naval vessels then in the harbor, but they granted these requests only as friendly and customary courtesy.

What Blount says about the Japanese man-of-war is equally ex-parte absurd, and egotistic. For weeks after his arrival in Honolulu he had not even met or spoken with the Japanese minister. He had neglected to call upon the Japanese official, and did not ask me to take him to the Japanese legation and introduce him to the Japanese representative.

Touching certain incidents of suspicion and alarm in Honolulu regarding some of the Japanese in the islands and the sudden appearance there of a powerful Japanese iron-clad, in addition to a smaller vessel there, in February and March, prior to Mr. Blount's arrival, I had taken the most prompt precautionary steps, and fully informed both Secretaries Foster and Gresham, who were at the head of the Department of State in those months. How much solid foundation there really was for the excitement and anxiety in Hawaii at that time in regard to the Japanese it was impossible positively to ascertain. But the circumstances were such that I would have been derelict as a minister of the United States, which has a large preponderance of interests and commercial rights in the islands, not to have been vigilant in the discharge of my duty. Several weeks before the fall of the monarchy I had been authoritatively informed that the newly arrived Japanese commissioner would press on the Hawaiian Government the demand that the Japanese in the islands should have the right of suffrage precisely as the American, European, and native-born Hawaiians enjoyed it under the constitution of 1887.

Not long after the Provisional Government had been established, prior to Blount's arrival, I received positive information, both from the Japanese minister and from the Hawaiian minister of foreign affairs, of the renewal of the demand of the right of suffrage of the Japanese residents, and there was known to be much ferment, if not an organized movement, among some of the Japanese in the same direction. I had positively learned that the Japanese commissioner had sent, by the steamer Claudine, which left Honolulu with the Hawaiian Washington commissioners, January 19, a cable dispatch to his Government at Tokio, requesting that a powerful iron-clad be immediately sent to Honolulu, though it was known that a smaller Japanese warship was about to arrive there from San Francisco. I do not intend to criticise the Japanese commissioner for thinking he needed another Japanese warship at Honolulu at that time. He was entitled to his own opinions, and was bound only by the instructions of his own Government. It certainly was not strange that in the peculiar circumstances of the Hawaiian situation, there should be anxiety among the Americans and the members of the Provisional Government, as to what might grow out of this agitation about Japanese suffrage and certain Japanese ambitions as to the future control of the islands.

Sir Edward Arnold's elaborate letter in the London Telegraph of January 24 had arrived there. Arnold's Japanese residence and sympathizers were believed to have some relation to much that had been said in Tokio by certain European antagonists of American interests and aims, and it was well known that individuals, both in Japan and Hawaii, had enriched themselves in the supply of Japanese contract labor. These persons were known to be bitterly averse to the passage of the islands under the American flag, in the just fear that in such an event their contract-labor profits would no more swell their bank accounts. The fallen Queen's unscrupulous and oily attorney was known to be one who had shared in this kind of gain, and was still the agent of this ring of speculators. It was feared by the supporters of the Provisional Government that the fallen Queen, the lottery ring, and palace gang would not hesitate to promise to grant to the Japanese the right of suffrage in the islands, provided they would aid in restoring Liliuokalani to the throne. Among the nearly twenty thousand Japanese on the islands, there were said to be many who had served in the Japanese army at home. The sudden appearance of the Japanese iron-clad in Honolulu harbor could not fail to create anxiety and misunderstanding.

It was in these peculiar circumstances that I felt it my imperative duty to have repeated interviews with my Japanese colleague. He did not attempt to conceal from me his wish that the suffrage right should be granted to the Japanese residents. He was frank and earnest on the subject. I was equally frank in informing him that I had no authority to speak on that subject, but that in the then existing circumstances and in the maintenance of our superior rights and interests in Hawaii, I expressed to him the opinion that the United States would resist any encroachment on the soil or sovereignty of Hawaii, and that I would maintain this position until otherwise instructed by my Government. These friendly interviews, in which the long-existing friendship and mutual interests of our respective countries were fully gone over, gave pacifying results to the well informed, though they did not at once put an end to public anxiety as to the suffrage agitation and as to what use the fallen Queen's supporters might make of it. Every step of my action was duly reported to the Department of State, prior to Blount having any knowledge on the subject. His claim to have put an end to Hawaiian anxiety about rumored Japanese encroachment is as purely assumptive as his expression to me at my house, that to him the Harrison Administration was indebted for the strong Democratic support which was given it in the threatened war with Chile, and that Senator MORGAN, now chairman of the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs, could not aid much in the same direction, and is not a level-headed man.

In Blount's report, as given to the press, I find the following language:

"The two leading members of the committee, Messrs. Thurston and Smith, growing uneasy as to the safety of their persons, went to Minister Stevens to know if he would protect them in the event of their arrest, by the authorities, to which he gave his assent."

It is enough to say that there is not a semblance of truth in this assertion of Blount, made by him without his ever having hinted it to me or made any inquiry of me on the subject. He thus gives the signature of his indorsement to a charge which I never even heard of until I found it in Blount's printed report.

He says the response to the call of the committee of safety to land the men of the Boston "does not appear in the files of the legation." The meaning of this insinuation is obvious. Enough to say, there never was any such document. I received the invitation of the committee of safety for what it was worth, as I received other information on the same subject. I should have requested Capt. Wiltse to have landed his force, had not the committee of safety requested it. The critical circumstances existing, the fear of incendiarism, tumult, and robbery, and the danger of alarming panic in the night, more than justified our carrying out the standing instructions of the State and Navy Departments of July, 1887, which held the United States minister and naval commander responsible for the protection of American life and property, "and for the preservation of public order." The facts and the logic of the situation clearly indicated our duty.

It is well to state here that this landing of American forces in Honolulu had repeatedly taken place in a period running over many years. This happened in 1874, in 1887, in 1889, and was on the eve of being done on several other occasions. Several times prior to the events of January last I had been notified by the representatives of the Queen to be in readiness to receive a request to land our naval force. Repeatedly had our naval commanders during my official residence in Honolulu got everything in readiness to land, on information as to signs of danger which they and their officers had gathered by being in close touch with the then existing state of things.

The elements and forces of Hawaii in play in 1887, 1889, and in 1893 were and are essentially the same, the breadth and strength of the prevailing elements and forces in 1893 being more decisive than in the former periods. Those who assert to the contrary are not honest, else they do not understand what they have written about. To say that the overturn of the Hawaiian monarchy was bogus, a mere scare, is as absurd as would be the claim of those who might assert that the fall of Louis Phillipe in 1848 and of Louis Napoleon in 1871 was an illusion and a fraud.

Blount squarely asserts that I promised to aid the committee on safety by force. This is emphatically and categorically untrue. In reply to rival parties at different times, whether the representatives of the Queen or her opponents, my answer was always the same, that the force would not land until danger should be plainly imminent, and then only to protect American life and property, and to no one did I ever hint that I could, or would, recognize any but the de facto government, whether monarchical or republican, and as I said in my letter to Secretary Gresham, I here reaffirm that royalists and their opponents had equal access to the legation and to its official head. The best answer to the baseless charge that I promised to use force against the Queen is the order of Capt. Wiltse to his officers and his men, "To remain passive," and that no force was used, though the Queen, through her ministers, strongly requested it hours before the Provisional Government was recognized by me and all the other diplomatic representatives in Honolulu.

One of the most striking evidences of Blount's prejudiced, ex parte, and unwarranted statements is the following: "A meeting of the committee of safety held that night, January 16, at the house of Henry Waterhouse, next door to Minister Stevens's house, determined on the dethronement of the Queen, and selected officers."

The intent of the author of this language is obvious on its face. He wished it to be understood that this meeting was held near my residence for the purpose of easy access to, and in collusion with, the United States minister. What are the facts? Henry Waterhouse is an English merchant of wealth, of recognized character for integrity, intelligence, and of the most exemplary life. He has resided in the islands since early childhood, and is now a member of the Provisional Government. Though living so near me, he rarely talked Hawaiian political affairs with me, though he could but suppose that my private convictions must be in harmony with the prevailing views of all respectable Americans as to what had been going on in the islands for months. Of this meeting at the house of Henry Waterhouse, specified by Blount, I had no hint or knowledge at the time it was held, knew not of whom the meeting was composed, nor what was its action, and my first information as to the persons assembled at that meeting I obtained from Blount's report.

It is proper for me to say here that for three years prior to the Queen's coup d'état and fall, I had kept myself as thoroughly informed as possible as to the views, plans, and purposes of the several factions and parties that contended for control in Hawaiian political affairs. This was my imperative duty as a minister, and it was equally my duty to keep the State Department at Washington well informed as to all facts bearing on the actual situation. This necessarily compelled me to hold conversations with the best informed persons of the reform party, the Queen's party, and with the Wilcox and native Hawaiian party whose organized efforts for months was to induce or compel the Queen to break with her paramour, Marshal Wilson, whom they regarded a foreigner, who was born in Tahiti, of native mother and an English father, and who was very objectionable to the native Hawaiians, who believed Wilson stood between them and their sovereign, and who they well knew largely dictated at the palace. I was certainly as well informed of the views and plans of the royalists as I was of those of her opponents, generally carefully keeping my private opinions to myself.

Regarding the expectations and hopes of the Queen and her representatives in the exciting days from January 14 to January 17, and the views and hopes of her opponents, the following official documents speak for themselves.

Now, I read the document:

"The assurance conveyed by a royal proclamation by myself and ministers yesterday having been received by my native subjects and by them ratified at a mass meeting, was received in a different spirit by the meeting representing the foreign population and interests in my kingdom. It is now my desire to give to your excellency, as the diplomatic representative of the United States of America at my court, the solemn assurance that the present constitution will be upheld and maintained by me and ministers, and no changes will be made except by the method therein provided. I desire to express to your excellency this assurance in the spirit of that friendship which has ever existed between my kingdom and that of the Government of the United States of America, and which I trust will long continue.

LILIUOKALANI, R.

Samuel Parker, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Wm. H. Cornell, Minister of Finance; John F. Colburn, Minister of Interior; A. P. Peterson, Attorney-General.

Iolani Palace, Honolulu, January 17, 1893.

This earnestly pleading document from the fallen monarch and the terror-stricken lottery gang came to me more than twenty hours after the men of the Boston had landed. This plainly enough implies that the fallen Queen and her confidants then knew, as they could not have failed to know, that we had not taken part in her overthrow, which had already been accomplished. An hour later the fallen ministers came to the legation and urged on me the inquiry, if I could not use the United States force to sustain the Queen? My answer was what one can readily suppose it must have been—that the United States soldiers were on shore for a specific purpose, to protect American life and property, and could not take sides in aid of the fallen monarch nor with those who were then masters of the situation and were creating a new government.

It will throw light on this pleading message from the Queen more than forty-eight hours after her practical dethronement, to state that the landing of the United States forces in 1874 to put down a mob, which United States action resulted in securing Kalakaua on the throne, had had the effect of strongly fixing in the mind of Liliuokalani and her immediate supporters the idea that they had only to call on the United States minister whenever her power was in danger, and that the United States force would continue to adhere to an established policy in this regard. In this is the explanation that her fallen ministers came to me, with much assurance, to ask that I would use the United States forces to restore and support the fallen Liliuokalani. She and they could not see the very different case of her brother Kalakaua in 1874 and her own case January 17, 1893.

In a report to the Navy Department, dated January 16, Capt. Wiltse, after announcing the fact that the forces had been landed, says:

"While there has been no demonstration so far, there can be no doubt that the prompt landing of the battalion has saved life and property."

The request of Minister Stevens, upon which the captain acted, read as follows:

"UNITED STATES LEGATION, January 16, 1893.

"In view of the existing critical circumstances in Honolulu, indicating an inadequate legal force, I request you to land marines and sailors from the ship under your command for the protection of the United States legation and the United States consulate and to secure the safety of American life and property.

"JOHN L. STEVENS.

"To Capt. WILTSE, U. S. N."

The order of Capt. Wiltse to Lieut. Commander Swinburne, who commanded the naval battalion on shore, reads as follows, under the same date:

"You will take command of the battalion, and land in Honolulu for the purpose of protecting our legation and the lives and property of American citizens, and to assist in the preservation of public order. Great prudence must be exercised by both officers and men, and no action taken that is not fully warranted by the condition of affairs, and by the conduct of those who may be inimical to the treaty rights of American citizens. You will inform me at the earliest practicable moment of any change in the situation."

Mr. Blount's shamefully unfair attempt to cast suspicion on myself in the matter of the hall for the men of the Boston, on the first evening of their landing, I have answered in my letter to Secretary Gresham. I will repeat my language here.

After I had made my request to Capt. Wiltse to land his men as a precautionary safeguard to American life and property, he and his officers informed me that their men must have shelter for the night. Without special information in that regard, I had supposed that the ship's marines had tents of their own for their customary use in case of emergency on shore. I at once wrote a note and sent it by messenger to secure a large hall that was supposed to be available. The man in charge of the hall was several miles away. I had not known of the existence of the Arion Hall until that evening, when a messenger with my note was sent to the supposed agent of the Arion Hall, who was a royalist. He returned me a courteous answer, saying he would be pleased to let the hall for the specified purpose, but he had ceased to be the agent, informing me who had then charge of the hall. This required a third note and a third effort of the messenger, which proved successful. So much time had been thus consumed that the Boston's marines and sailors were obliged to stand weary hours in the streets before they were able to go to their night quarters. All of them would have been lodged at the legation and consulate but for want of room, where as many as possible were received, these localities being several streets and squares from the palace and Government building. For the occupation of Arion Hall by the men of the Boston the committee of public safety and supporters of the Provisional Government had no more responsibility than Secretary Gresham himself.

Now, let me say right here, there is elsewhere an intimation that the Arion Hall, occupied by the marines, was very close to the palace of the Queen, and that their guns were literally trained on the palace. In relation to that, I wish to say that the opera house is the house occupied in the former revolution by our troops, and that faces the palace, the palace being a considerable distance off; that at that time it was fired into, and consequently the owners would not allow the troops to be placed in that building at the recent revolution. The hall Arion is in the rear, some distance from the large opera house, and the palace is not in sight of the hall at all. The guns could not be trained from there on the palace by any possibility.

One of the chief objects in view by myself and Capt. Wiltse in landing the marines and sailors was to quiet the fear and panic in the city that incendiary fires might be set by irresponsible parties for sake of plunder. This fear was augmented by the fact that most of the buildings of the city are of wood. The request made of me by Capt. Wiltse and his officials when they came ashore was a hall for shelter, and maps of the city to enable them to act effectively if tumult and incendiarism should come, so that they would know how to act with rapidity and efficiency. To obtain the hall and secure the necessary maps occupied my time until late in the evening, there being only one map of the city in the legation, others being obtained by application at different private houses.

A copy of the call of the committee of safety, which Blount insinuates that I wished to conceal from him, had been promptly forwarded to Washington in January, and was in the printed pamphlet of the State Department documents ordered published by the Senate, a copy of which I supposed Blount must have brought with him when he came to the islands.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to copy here the following from Blount to Gresham, dated June 28, 1893:

"In my dispatch to the Department of April 26 I said: 'Mr. Paul Neumann is generally regarded here as a bright, plausible, and unscrupulous person.' I desire now to say that so far as the expression 'unscrupulous' is concerned a better knowledge of public opinion satisfies me that I was not justified in its use.

"JAMES H. BLOUNT,
"Special Commissioner of the United States."

Why this remarkable change of opinion? So long as he supposed Neumann wished to make a trade with the United States or with the Provisional Government for a cash consideration of all Liliuokalani claims, Blount regarded Neumann a knave. As soon as this astute commissioner ascertained that Neumann was in full accord with Spreckels and Blount for Liliuokalani's restoration to the throne, at once Blount immediately learned that Neumann is "a right down" good fellow. So much for conclusive evidence that Spreckels, Neumann, and Blount were then, as now, rowing the same boat, and closely linked in the conspiracy to damage the action of Harrison's Administration, and of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on the question of annexation. To the same object Blount devoted much of his report to disapprove and repudiate the action of Secretary Marcy and the Democratic Administration of 1854, in authorizing our commissioners at Honolulu to negotiate a treaty of annexation on lines similar to those of President Harrison and the Senate committee of February last.

I wish to say right here that Paul Neumann made, I suppose, an official call on me when he was in Washington. He is a bright, smart fellow, undoubtedly. He called on me and informed me that he represented the deposed Queen. He had a two hours' interview. He never intimated to me in that interview that there was any complaint or any cause of complaint against the American minister or against the naval forces of the United States. He simply made an appeal to me that we should pay that Queen a sum of money for the Queen's lands, which we had taken from her, and then an annuity to support her. I never learned while Mr. Paul Neumann was here that he said anything as the Queen's agent except as to a money recompense for the wrongs to which she had been subjected.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say here, with the permission of the Senator, that perhaps others have had a similar experience. Mr. Neumann brought to me a letter of introduction from an old army friend of mine, and made about the same statement to me as that which the Senator has stated he made to him. I learned from him that his chief errand was to get a pecuniary allowance made for Queen Liliuokalani.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Stevens proceeds:

This tilt of Blount, Spreckels, and Neumann against Marcy, Grant, Seward, Fish, Blaine, Harrison, and other leading American statesmen must amuse the American public as much as other recent transactions hostile to the American colony in Hawaii are exciting just public indignation.

So far as the affidavits of John F. Colburn and A. P. Peterson and Charles L. Hopkins, and the letter of W. H. Cornwell conflict with any writing or act of mine I will not multiply words. The first named is a notorious corruptionist with some amiable qualities, who aided in bribing the legislative members to vote out the Jones-Wilcox ministry and to pass the lottery bill, and he demanded and received as compensation for his infamous services a few hours of occupancy of the Hawaiian interior department, and Peterson is the man who aided in the distribution of the lottery stock for the purchase of legislative vote, and held the Queen's authority to constitute a lottery cabinet, and to aid the Queen to proclaim a reactionary constitution.

As to Samuel Parker, whose testimony is used to discredit my action, I would gladly say little. Mostly of native Hawaiian stock, he has a small fraction of Anglo-Saxon blood. Good-natured, free-hearted, ignorant, fond of luxuriant living, a notorious spendthrift, he has wasted a large fortune left him by his grandfather and uncle. His word and his note are of little value among the bankers and business men of Honolulu. For years trying to play politics and to be the Queen's minister, for which service he is without capacity, he has competed with Wilson for the control and the favors of the recent immoral occupant of the palace. He was a ready tool in the hands of Peterson and Cornwell in the palace conspiracy which precipitated the fall of the monarchy. It seems impossible that Blount should not have learned of the real character of the four fallen ministers whose words he cites.

Of the Dr. G. Trousseau who figures conspicuously among Blount's affidavits, whitewashing the notorious Wilson and Liliuokalani, and abusively reflecting on my official action, I need only say that he is an adventurous Frenchman with whose printed record in Paris and moral career in Honolulu I will not soil this paper. Of J. A. Cummins it is correct to remark that what is herein said of Samuel Parker in most respects applies to Cummins. A half-white, left valuable property by his English father, he has wasted it in extravagant living and shameful expenditures. For years Cummins has had two wives at the same time in his home. It is not strange that W. T. Seward unites in testimony with Cummins, for Seward is a kind of house clerk and steward of Cummins, occupying the same home, in which, it is well known in Honolulu, there is a great deal of unlawful freedom of life.

Throughout his ponderous document Blount ignores that the division between the Queen's supporters is not the ordinary division of parties in most countries. In Hawaii now and in recent years it is a division between bad men and good men, between men of moral character, property, and intelligence, and those of the opposite characteristics. The distinction is as broad as between the notorious Boss Tweed and his supporters, and the best citizens of New York, who overturned that powerful and corrupt ring.

Regarding the Governor Cleghorn, whose protest Blount speaks of relative to landing the men of the Boston, little need be said. Under the monarchy, prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1887, the Hawaiian Governor had some importance. The office was abolished by that constitution. The Legislature of 1890 restored the office as an honorary title, giving little power or duty. Cleghorn is a brother-in-law to the fallen Liliuokalani, is the reputed father of the so-called princess now residing in England, whose half-sister is married to the English minister's son. Cleghorn is completely under the influence and follows the advice of English Minister Wodehouse. His protest came to me after the landing of the Boston's marines.

Hopkins belonged to the same gang as Cornwell and Peterson. Cornwell has been one of the intimate palace associates of Kalakaua in his bestial, lecherous life and shameful transactions. He is of notoriously immoral habits. He has been a cheat on the race course, betting against his own horses. He was one of the most active in aiding Peterson and Colburn to bribe the legislature in forcing out the Jones-Wilcox ministry, whom all the responsible men of the islands wished to continue. He had been repeatedly voted out of the ministry after a very brief stay, by large majorities, all the honest members voting against him. Prior to Cornwell's two expulsions, Neumann had been voted out August 20, 1892, by a vote of 31 to 10. Reappointed by the Queen September 12, he was voted out October 17 by 31 to 15. He was a close confederate with Peterson and Cornwell. He was known to be of the contract labor ring which was bleeding the planters. With good reasons he was believed to be the author of the Queen's revolutionary despotic new constitution.

Losing caste in California as a political corruptionist, he had years before gone to Honolulu under the flattering auspices of Claus Spreckels. He had played poker with Kalakaua, to the depletion of the weak King's purse. He is the man whom the Queen sent to Washington to get her restored to the throne, or to sell out her claim to the crown in hard cash. He is the man by whom Blount absurdly hints I had sent dispatches to Washington, on an errand for which on no occasion had I ever employed anyone. Blount asserts he received this information from Spreckels. What a remarkable trio, Spreckels, Neuman, and Blount, two honest German Jews, and the astute, impartial, unprejudiced, newborn diplomatist, who had represented that he was the Democratic leader who had led his party to support Harrison in the threatened Chilean war, while he severely denounced Admiral Brown and Minister Egan. Spreckels, Neumann, and Blount! Who will decipher the enigma, explain the philosophy, and state the substantial considerations which bind this trio together?

The testimony of hundreds of such would not counterbalance the words of Minister Thurston, President Dole, and Henry Waterhouse, among honest men who know the respective parties. As to Wilson, the Queen's immoral favorite for many years, whom Blount attempts to whitewash, I will not soil these pages by giving even the notorious facts in this regard.

As to my recognition of the Provisional Government, I reaffirm what I said in my recent letter to Secretary Gresham.

Queen Liliuokalani inaugurated the revolution by attempting to destroy the constitution by revolutionary means. From Saturday afternoon, January 14, to January 16, there was no government in Honolulu, except in the united and self-possessed attitude of the citizens, who assembled in a great mass meeting on January 16, and consummated their efforts for law and order by the establishment of the Provisional Government on the 17th, which was promptly acknowledged by all the foreign representatives, who were familiar with the circumstances of its creation. It was nearly fifty hours after Liliuokalani and her favorites had destroyed her throne by a revolutionary outbreak when the men of the Boston landed. In the exciting hours preceding and following her fall, her representatives, as well as those who formed the Provisional Government, had equal access to the legation.

To all proper inquiries my answer was that the United States marines could not take sides, but whatever de facto government might exist would have to be recognized. When I did recognize it, late in the afternoon of the 17th, the Provisional Government was complete master of the situation, had full control of the city and of the government archives, the police station being surrounded and at the mercy of the Provisional Government. It was a small building in which the disorganized and powerless followers of the fallen Queen's paramour marshal took refuge, and they must surrender in a few hours by mere force of hunger. The Provisional Government knew its power to possess the station at once, but wished not to take a single life of its occupants. It deemed it wiser to await their surrender. Had the Queen's supporters dared to resist the organization of the new government, their only possible chance to do so was during Sunday and Monday of the 15th and 16th, while the citizens were attending their mass meeting, selecting their committees of public safety, and preparing to organize a government, as openly as public meetings are held in any American city. They did not dare to attempt to arrest or interfere with the aroused white citizens. It was a united and irresistible movement of the same men, with now increased numbers, that took away the despotic powers of King Kalakaua in 1887, and crushed the Wilcox revolt of 1889. They gathered at the armory with their rifles in hand, which were increased by other arms openly carried in a carriage from a gun store, with only three men in charge. The only government that existed, or could exist under those circumstances, was the Provisional Government.

I am fully aware that I have made this paper too lengthy. I regret to tax the public patience with words of mine. Against all just expectations I have been forced to expose the anomalous, the un-American, and most unfair course of Blount and associates against my official conduct, my honor, and all that a public man holds dear. This extraordinary assault on the American colony in Hawaii, antagonizing the American Christian civilization there established at the cost of the lives and labors of noble American men and women, this strange turning back on an American policy of more than half a century, this wanton disregard of the opportunity to assume jurisdiction and ownership of a territorial and maritime prize, with a clean title and without the cost of a single life, is justly causing profound indignation among the American people. These strange and unpatriotic proceedings in the presence of our national rivals is making a most shameful page of American history, which our future, if not our present, statesmen and generation will repudiate and blot out by wise and effective measures.

JOHN L. STEVENS.

AUGUSTA, ME., November 29, 1893.

So much for the act of piracy with which Minister Stevens is charged.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, but for the fact that I am on the eve of leaving the city and desire to avoid any appearance of evading responsibility in regard to this question I should not detain the Senate.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that I do not speak as the advocate or special defender of the Administration. It would be a degradation of the issues involved in the question before the Senate for me to take any such position. I speak as an American Senator and an American citizen in regard to questions involving the honor and welfare of our common country.

It is greatly to be regretted that partisan malevolence has so distinctly shown itself in the debate on these great questions. With protestations that they desire no personal aspect to be given to this argument, and with the statement that in their judgment the real issue should not be discussed until the evidence is before the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] take occasion to assail everybody who differs with them in regard to the Hawaiian question, and undertake to place before the American people their side of this issue in order to take possession of public opinion in the United States. I do not choose by silence to be put in the attitude of acquiescing in the position taken by those Senators.

The Senator from Maine knows that I have the greatest personal regard for him; there is no Senator in this Chamber with whom my relations have been more pleasant; but I am compelled to say, with due respect, that when it comes to a political or partisan question, I would just as little trust that Senator as a hungry wolf when the bleat of a farmer's lamb is heard in his immediate vicinity. [Laughter.] With all his generous instincts, it is impossible for that Senator to be anything else but an intense New England Republican. [Laughter.] Like his friend, Mr. Stevens, his whole political action is governed by the great truth that "the earth belongs to the saints, and we are the saints." [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Missouri for the compliment.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt, and I mean it in the kindest and most fraternal spirit. That Senator knows that I would be incapable of saying anything disrespectful to him; but the truth of argument and logic requires that his correct position, as it is seen by others, should be placed before the country.

Mr. President, the Senator's friend, Mr. Stevens, defends his entire action in Hawaii in the concluding sentence of his remarkable address by saying that he and his colleagues were there to Christianize the Hawaiian people. They have Christianized them out of their country; they have pursued the old New England fashion of taking possession in the name of God, and then dividing out under laws made by themselves. [Laughter.]

It is not a question between Mr. Blount and Mr. Stevens; it is minimizing the issue to bring here any such personal question. I do not know Mr. Stevens; he may be all his friend the Senator from Maine paints him to be, a godly, saintly, unexceptionable, Christian gentleman. I do not question it, nor do I care anything about it. I propose to treat him as I should any other witness who brought himself into court and demanded my vote upon his evidence.

I do know Mr. Blount. While I am not here to defend him—for I should treat him in the same way as Mr. Stevens—almost twenty years of intimate knowledge of James H. Blount authorizes me to state in the most public and emphatic manner that a purer man, publicly and privately, never has appeared upon the arena of American politics. For twenty years he was the honored representative of one of the great States of the South: the calcium light of public opinion and partisan malice shone upon him by day and night, and I defy any man living to bring here one shadow upon his character. He has his opinions, like every affirmative man and every man who is worthy of the name, but that anything he says is deliberately false, that anything in his career justifies the Senator from Maine to stand here and with his aggressive voice declare that there is not one word of truth in his report, I distinctly and emphatically deny.

He needs no defense from me. The American people, and especially the Southern people, know James H. Blount. If he had been a dishonest man, long ago would his reputation have been torn to tatters, for he has occupied the most prominent committee positions in the House of Representatives; again and again his people have returned him, and even the partisan press found no flaw in his record, and he left public life voluntarily, and not coerced into retirement.

My friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests in that connection—and it is simply justice to Mr. Blount and his State—that in the article which the Senator from Maine was kind enough to read us from his friend Mr. Stevens he charges Mr. Blount with being a diplomatic neophyte, who knew nothing about the relations of this Government with foreign nations. Mr. Blount was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the popular branch of Congress, and discharged his duties, so far as I know, with the greatest acceptability to his constituents and to the country at large; and for this saintly gentleman from New England, who has been canonized here by the Senator from Maine, to denounce a Representative who for twenty years has served in the Congress of the United States as a neophyte in diplomacy is simply another specimen of that godly arrogance which we have always heard from that quarter of this country. [Laughter.]

Now, take the testimony of Mr. Stevens. From the beginning to the end of it you can see but one animus, and that is his determined effort to annex the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. Every line, every word, and every syllable is alive with that distinct idea. I have a right to dissect his testimony and see the motives which have actuated him. Take the beginning of his address:

> A deep sense of obligation to my country and an American's duty to defend an insulted, threatened, and struggling American colony, planted as righteously and firmly on the North Pacific isles as our Pilgrim fathers established themselves on Plymouth Rock, demand that I shall make an answer," etc.

In other words, plainly Mr. Stevens there states that there is no question about the legitimacy of the Provisional Government in Hawaii; that they are there by as righteous a title—and he uses the superlative—as that which our Pilgrim Fathers had to the soil upon which they landed when they came to Plymouth Rock. I shall not stop to discuss the legality of their title; let that go. My object now is to treat with the motive of this gentleman in all that he has said and all that he has done; and I take his own language in order to show it. But I come now specifically to discuss this matter, and I am sorry the Senator from Maine is not here in order that he might defend his distinguished friend from Maine.

In the newspaper report which Mr. Stevens was answering Mr. Blount stated that when he arrived at Honolulu there came off to the steamship in the harbor the American minister, Mr. John L. Stevens, with a committee of the Annexation Club, and that Mr. Stevens tendered to him a furnished house, with servants and a carriage, at any cost, "from nothing up." I quote the exact language. Mr. Blount opens his report with the statement that this minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, Mr. Stevens, whose heart is lacerated and bleeding by the hauling down of the old flag, came in his diplomatic character with a committee of the Annexation Club, organized to annex those islands to the United States, with that distinct and only purpose, and tendered him, Mr. Blount, a furnished house, with servants and equipage, at any cost, from nothing up. That is the distinct charge, and I quote in hæc verba.

Mr. President, that was not only unseemly and undignified conduct, but outrageous conduct on the part of the minister of the United States. He says that he was neutral between these factions, that he simply represented the people of the United States and our national glory and honor. Was that consistent with the idea of his going out with a committee from the Annexation Club, the head of one of these factions, and attempting to take possession of the agent of the United States, the commissioner who came there upon this specific and identical business? What ordinary juror trying a case of meum et tuum in a circuit court would doubt the animus of a witness, even in a matter of dollars and cents, with this testimony before him?

But Mr. Stevens undertakes to answer that specifically, and I want to hold him now to his answer, not technically—for I am dealing with him in the most liberal and catholic spirit, giving him the benefit of every doubt. What is his answer? I will ask the Secretary to read it, and I will ask the Senate, as these words come from the desk, to recollect Mr. Blount's charge, and see what Mr. Stevens says to Mr. Blount's statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNDER ROYAL ESPIONAGE.

> A total stranger, it was impossible for Mr. Blount to know how unfitting it was for him to take up his quarters where he was certain to be surrounded by royalists, and where the supporters of the Provisional Government would be reluctant to go. The hotel was kept by one who had served as Kalakaua's chamberlain, who was one of the principal persons in a syndicate that had cheated the Hawaiian Government out of nearly $100,000, a transaction which Minister Merrill had officially reported to Secretary Bayard, and this man was the leading member of a firm that sought to do its chief business with England, a thoroughly unprincipled opponent of the Provisional Government and of American predominance in the islands. He employed as his active assistant in managing the hotel a highly educated Englishman, of disreputable character, who had written in the Hawaiian British newspaper, under anonymous signature, articles abusive of the United States and grossly falsifying our Government's treatment of the Indians.
> Residing at that hotel, Mr. Blount was under the constant espionage of the palace adventurers. As a precautionary safeguard against thus shutting out the Americans from ready access to Commissioner Blount, a wealthy and a highly respectable widow lady of the American colony was ready to grant the use of her house to Mr. and Mrs. Blount, the commissioner to pay the same amount it would cost him to live at the royalist hotel. This private house was situated near the United States legation, in the quarter of the city where annexationists and royalists could have unobstructed access to the commissioner, and he could conveniently avail himself of the legation records. This polite offer of an American resident to an American commissioner did not originate with the Provisional Government, nor did the Provisional Government have anything whatever to do with the proposed arrangement.
> The effort in his report to cast imputation on the Provisional Government and myself as to the offer of the American house to an American commissioner will be estimated at its true value by the American public.

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President, it will be estimated at its true value. I undertake to say now that Mr. Stevens has not denied the statement of Mr. Blount, and he knows that he has not denied it. What is his answer to the specific allegation that he came with a committee of the annexation club and tendered this house and these servants and that equipage at any cost, from nothing up, as Mr. Blount graphically expresses it? His reply is that a very respectable American lady was willing to allow Mr. Blount and Mrs. Blount to occupy her house at the same board and rent for which he could secure apartments at the Royal Hotel. It is admitted by this Mr. Stevens that Blount has told the truth in regard to it. It is admitted that he met Mr. Blount, in connection with the committee of this Annexation Club, which made the extraordinary offer to him, and he evades the statement of Blount by an appeal to the American people to decide the issue between them.

Mr. President, it is extraordinary that Senators upon the other side who deprecate personalities should bring this foulmouthed and scurrilous witness here into court. Take the printed remarks which were read by the Senator from Maine, and who in the Hawaiian Islands opposed to Mr. Stevens in regard to annexation has escaped his billingsgate? He has taken up every man in those islands from the highest to the lowest ranks in life and disposed of them seriatim by personal charges, criminal some of them, and others so vulgar as to preclude me from criticising them further in this presence.

That is not all. This witness is insincere and contradicts himself. He says in the opening part of the speech made on his return to Maine that the Provisional Government was an absolute de facto government at the time he put those marines on shore; that it was firmly established; that there was no disorder. He makes good every statement that Blount has made in his report. Why did he take the military force of the United States and land it upon Hawaiian soil if that Government was already firmly established and able to preserve order in the streets of Honolulu? He denies absolutely and emphatically that he ever had any agreement with the Provisional Government that he should use the marines in order to sustain that Government. Mr. President, I grant it. What intelligent man connected with that Government, knowing Mr. Stevens and knowing his opinion and knowing his determination to bring about annexation, wanted any promise from him? They might as well have exacted a promise from each other, because they knew what his intentions were without his putting them either in writing or giving them verbally.

The flag was torn down—"Old Glory desecrated," as some of the press of the Provisional Government denominate it. I should like to know from Senators upon the opposite side of this Chamber whether the flag was put there as an emblem of sovereignty over the Hawaiian Islands? I beg them, when they give the elaborate arguments we are now promised, to tell me whether that flag of our country was put there to denote sovereignty over the Hawaiian Islands, or was it put there simply to protect the property of citizens of the United States who were there for legitimate purposes, and not to attack the established Government?

Was there any use for the flag when there was perfect order, according to Mr. Stevens, and a de facto government supported by the entire population? Why keep the flag there uselessly as a threat to any portion of those people when the plea under which Mr. Stevens acted had been fully answered and there was complete order at Honolulu and throughout the entire islands?

But there is a part of the address of Mr. Stevens which the Senator from Maine did not read, that shows what sort of an impartial witness he is. There is one appeal always omnipotent with certain people in this country, and that is the late war. Beaten logically, beaten rhetorically, geographically, or ecclesiastically they fall back on the war. "Oh, you tried to tear down the Government; you were a rebel." That is the ultimate resort with these people.

Now, this man Stevens, this God-fearing, charitable, saintly old logician of Maine, understood that. Here is what he says. I ask the Secretary to read that part of the argument of Mr. Stevens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ignoring his inferiority of official rank, which, according to established rules the world over was below that of minister resident, between a consul-general and chargé d'affaires, with the utmost effort of will controlling my outraged sensibilities, while suffering a terrible affliction at the recent sad drowning of a gifted and beloved daughter, I endured this insolent treatment after thirteen years of service as United States minister, without a stain ever before attempted to be made on my official honor or my fidelity to American prestige and to American interests, never during my seventy-three years of life having lifted my voice, my hand, or my rifle against the flag of this American Republic.

Mr. VEST. Now, that was an argument against which nothing could prevail. I refer to that portion of it in which Mr. Stevens, not content with reciting his long and honorable career, appeals to the prejudices of the Northern people by saying that he never lifted his rifle against his Government. What did that have to do with the Hawaiian question? What did he mean by it except to array the prejudices of the loyal portion, so called, of the American people against Blount because he had been a Confederate soldier?

Why should Mr. Stevens have brought into this controversy regarding a great international question this statement that he had never lifted his rifle against the Government of the United States? I bring that out of his own mouth to show the animus which has incited and urged this man throughout the entire controversy, and by which he stands to-day. I take the conclusion of this gentleman's address, which I believe the Senator from Maine read. I ask the Secretary to read that again as a proper summing up to this remarkable testimony and recital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I suppose the Senator from Missouri does not think that for any special purpose I omitted to read that which he has just cited.

Mr. VEST. Oh, no; the Senator knows I do not think he suppresses anything. He is as frank and open an adversary as I ever met, and no doubt he has the same opinion of me politically that I have of him. Neither of us strikes below the belt. Now let the Secretary read what I have indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Against all just expectations, I have been forced to expose the anomalous, the un-American, and most unfair course of Blount and associates against my official conduct, my honor, and all that a public man holds dear. This extraordinary assault on the American colony in Hawaii, antagonizing the American Christian civilization there established at the cost of the lives and labors of noble American men and women; this strange turning back on an American policy of more than half a century; this wanton disregard of the opportunity to assume jurisdiction and ownership of a territorial and maritime prize with a clean title and without the cost of a single life, is justly causing profound indignation among the American people. These strange and unpatriotic proceedings in the presence of our national rivals is making a most shameful page of American history, which our future if not our present statesmen and generation will repudiate and blot out by wise and effective measures.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, there is the essence of this whole controversy. The crime committed by the President of the United States, for which he has been threatened with impeachment, is that he does not favor the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to this country. If that constitutes a crime I am a criminal, and in my judgment so are a large majority of the American people. Mr. Stevens, whatever else he be, understands the art of summing up his position, and that is in the concluding portion of his address. We have failed "to seize a marine prize." The Senator from Maine objects to the word piracy. That is very much like it. We have failed to seize a prize; we have failed to carry out American policy. I shall have something more to say about that directly; but there is the crime which the President of the United States has committed, in which, as I have already stated, in my judgment a large majority of the American people participate.

Mr. President, the plain issue is before us whether we are to quit now the traditional policy of this country established by Washington and carried out by Jefferson and concurred in by Madison and Jackson and Buchanan, and now by Cleveland, or are we to depart from that policy and now venture upon the great colonial system of the European powers. I assert it here now, and I want this made distinctly an issue, and as far as I am able I propose that the American people shall understand it: It is proposed now that instead of having a compact, continental republic, as our fathers intended, we are to have a great, expansive, territory-acquiring Government, extending even to the islands of the ocean and the uttermost parts of the earth.

Is it pretended, and will any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber undertake to say here now, that the Hawaiian Islands are to be held as colonies? Where is the warrant in the Constitution for holding any colonies? What is to be done with the Hawaiian Islands after we have taken possession of them and put the flag of the United States above them as an emblem of sovereignty? Are we to hold them as England holds India or Australia, as France has her island possessions in all the oceans of the world? What can we do with them except to bring them in as States? Here is the question, whether we are to add the Kanakas, the Japanese, Chinese, Indians, and characterless adventurers of Honolulu to the population of the United States already threatened in its moral integrity by undue immigration; and because the President of the United States dares to doubt that, he must be impeached or threatened with impeachment.

Mr. President, for one I shall hail with gladness the narrowing or defining this issue to the limits I have stated. The people of the United States want no colonies. We want the Government that our fathers made for us and that we intend to preserve for our children. We want a compact republic in which every citizen is represented; a compact republic with no islands out in the ocean around which we are to gather an enormous fleet and upon which we are to place expensive fortifications—a pawn to be seized in the event of war with a great power of Europe when an attack upon a single Kanaka would involve the honor and dignity of our whole country and require the expenditure of the last dollar and the last drop of blood to defend him.

We have heard a great deal from the Senator from Massachusetts about the unconstitutional action of the President in sending Blount as an agent or commissioner to Hawaii. I have no disposition to argue that question at length, but I want to refer that Senator to Miscellaneous Document No. 109 of the Senate and to the minority report signed by JOHN T. MORGAN, Eli Saulsbury, Joseph E. Brown, and H. B. Payne, in answer to that argument. I ask the Secretary to read now that portion of the minority report in regard to this same contention made by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations in respect to the British treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

There is no fault in the manner of negotiating this treaty, and the President has not in any way exceeded his constitutional powers, or withheld any courtesy due to the Senate in respect of the agents selected by him to conduct the negotiation, or in the time or place of negotiating or concluding the treaty.

On the other question, as to the form in which the negotiation has been conducted and the authority of the two plenipotentiaries, Mr. Putnam and Mr. Angell, to act, without a confirmation by the Senate, we rely upon the precedents cited in the annexed brief of cases that seem to conclude any question on this point.

The table hereto appended, marked C, will furnish an easy reference to all the appointments of diplomatic agents to negotiate and conclude conventions, agreements, and treaties with foreign powers since 1792. The whole number of persons appointed or recognized by the President, without the concurrence or advice of the Senate, or the express authority of Congress, as agents to conduct negotiations and conclude treaties, is 438. Three have been appointed by the Secretary of State and 32 have been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It will be seen that an interval of 53 years, between 1827 and 1880, occurred during which the President did not ask the consent of the Senate to any such appointment.

The following important appointments and many others were made when the Senate was in session:

March 2, 1793.—David Humphries. By Washington. Commissioned plenipotentiary to treat with Algiers. Congress adjourned on that day.

January 26, 1832.—Edmund Roberts. By Jackson. Commissioner to treat with Cochin China and Siam. Congress in session.

May 3, 1838.—Nathaniel Niles. By Van Buren. Special agent to negotiate treaty with Sardinia. Congress in session.

March 28, 1846.—A. Dudley Mann. By Polk. Special agent to treat with sundry states of Germany. Congress in session.

The constitutional power of the President to select the agents through whom he will conduct such business is not affected by the fact that the Senate is or is not in session at the time of such appointment, or while the negotiation is being conducted; or the fact that he may prefer to withhold, even from the Senate, or from other countries, the fact that he is treating with a particular power, or on a special subject.

The secret-service fund that Congress votes to the Department of State annually is that from which such agents are usually paid. That is the most important reason for such appropriations.

The following is a summary of Appendix C:

Persons appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate:
1792. William Carmichael, William Shott, to treat with Spain.

1886. George H. Bates, to treat with Tonga.
Total number, 3.

Persons appointed by the President:
Total number, 438.

Mr. VEST. I desire now to call attention to a tabulated statement of the number of officers appointed by Presidents of the United States while the Senate was in session and when it was not in session, and without the concurrence of that body. This statement is put as an appendix to the minority report of the committee. The very first appointment was made by President Washington, that of G. Morris, October 13, 1789, as a private agent, who held no other office at the time. In other words, the Father of his Country selected a private individual, who was not connected with the diplomatic portion of the Government, and made him his agent to go abroad and negotiate a treaty without consulting the Senate; and, according to the Senator from Massachusetts, the Father of his Country was treading upon very slippery ice, and very thin at that. I should like to know whether some distinguished Senator rose at that era in our Republic and threatened Washington with impeachment for having done what Cleveland has done to-day.

There are three hundred and eighty-odd appointments in this list made by Presidents without the consent of the Senate to negotiate treaties, to perform the most important diplomatic functions; and to-day it has been reserved to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts to find that the Constitution was violated, and applause is elicited from the galleries by threatening the President of the United States with impeachment for having done what all his predecessors have done.

Immediately succeeding the appointment of Morris was the appointment of John Paul Jones. He is pretty well known to readers of American history. He was an admiral in the United States Navy at the time, and was appointed by the President without the knowledge of the Senate a commissioner to treat with Algiers for peace and friendship, and for the ransom of captive United States citizens.

Going on through the list we find the appointment of John James Appleton, May 12, 1825, appointed by the Secretary of State without the consent of the Senate, to arrange for the settlement of the claims of citizens of the United States against the Kingdom of Naples; and again January 26, 1822, Edmund Roberts, appointed commissioner by the President, without the knowledge of the Senate, to conclude treaties of navigation and commerce with Cochin China, Siam, and Muscat; and again Benjamin E. Green, June 13, 1849, appointed by the President as special agent in Haiti and the Dominican Republic, to conclude a treaty of commerce with Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the morning hour has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. VEST. I desire to occupy only a few minutes more. I beg pardon of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The Calendar will be considered as having been laid before the Senate, and the Senator from Missouri will proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. VEST. June 15, 1850, A. Dudley Mann was appointed special agent to the Swiss Confederation, to conclude with the Swiss Confederation a treaty "concerning all matters and subjects interesting to both nations." Mr. Mann, as well as these other gentlemen, let it be understood, occupied no diplomatic position, but were appointed by the President and Secretary of State from private life in order to perform these delicate functions.

Again, James B. Bowlin was appointed by the President, without the consent of the Senate, to conclude a treaty with New Granada with reference to a transit across the Isthmus of Panama.

I have read out of this list of over three hundred and eighty only those who at the time of their appointment held no diplomatic or official position whatever. I have not read the long list of those who were appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate and who were already in office, ministers plenipotentiary and resident at foreign courts, but I have read those who occupied no official position, in order to meet the contention that, as Mr. Stevens was minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Honolulu, no one else ought to have been sent there to perform diplomatic functions.

But we have heard a great deal about Paramount Blount. I read from the newspaper report of his instructions the following in regard to that much-quoted word. Mr. Gresham, in his instructions to Mr. Blount, says:

> You will investigate and fully report to the President all the facts you can learn respecting the condition of affairs in the Hawaiian Islands, the causes of the revolution by which the Queen's Government was overthrown, the sentiment of the people toward existing authority, and, in general, all that can fully enlighten the President touching the subjects of your mission.
> To enable you to fulfill this charge, your authority in all matters touching the relations of this Government to the existing or other government of the islands, and the protection of our citizens therein, is paramount, and in you alone, acting in coöperation with the commander of the naval forces, is vested full discretion and power to determine when such forces should be landed or withdrawn.

In other words, Mr. Blount is given power above Stevens, as the President had a right to do, as had been done in hundreds of other cases since the foundation of the Government when other agents had been appointed by this Government and given diplomatic functions above the ministers resident at foreign courts.

As a matter of course, this whole paper must be taken together; and what the President meant is evident from the subsequent portion of it:

> Should it be necessary to land an armed force upon Hawaiian territory on occasions of popular disturbance, when the local authority may be unable to give adequate protection to the life and property of citizens of the United States, the assent of such authority should first be obtained, if it can be done without prejudice to the interests involved. Your power in this regard should not, however, be claimed to the exclusion of similar measures by the representatives of other powers for the protection of the lives and property of their citizens or subjects residing in the islands.
> While the United States claim no right to interfere in the political or domestic affairs or in the internal conflicts of the Hawaiian Islands otherwise than as herein stated, or for the purpose of maintaining any treaty or other rights which they possess, this Government will adhere to its consistent and established policy in relation to them, and it will not acquiesce in domestic interference by other powers.

I affirm here now that taking this instrument altogether, it is simply a repetition and affirmation of the distinct, emphatic, and well-outlined policy of the United States from the foundation of the Government. Since the time when George Washington declared in his Farewell Address that this country should not interfere with foreign nations as to their domestic affairs, that we should enter into no entangling alliances, that we should maintain our own institutions and be satisfied with that, from the time when Washington and Jefferson refused to take part with France against England in the war of 1793, when Genet was given his letters of recall because he insisted upon embroiling this country in a foreign war, down through the terms of Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Buchanan, and now through the term of Cleveland, this has been the established policy of the people of this country. If it is proposed now to overturn it, let us know it and we are ready for the issue.

No demagogy about pulling down the old flag, no talk about raising your rifle against the Government, no personal abuse of the President or anybody else will suffice on this issue. We intend to know whether you mean that the Government of the United States shall trample under foot its traditions, its history, the teachings of its greatest men, and go out upon diplomatic raids throughout the world for the purpose of interfering with the internal and domestic affairs of other people.

Mr. President, I deal with this matter in entire frankness, and I have no disposition to conceal my dissent from one expression which has been published in the press as coming from the Secretary of State in regard to the policy of this Government as to Liliuokalani.

As I understand the condition of affairs in Hawaii to-day, the Provisional Government is a de facto government. As I understand international law, a de facto government has all the rights, so far as other nations are concerned, of a de jure government. Whether that Government be established rightfully or wrongfully it is to day a de facto government, and any assault upon it by armed force on the part of the United States or any other country must be an act of war which can alone be brought about by the action of Congress.

I do not understand that Mr. Gresham, the Secretary of State, meant that armed force would be employed. He is an eminent jurist. He has just come from the bench.

After stating his profound conviction, in which I share, that the Provisional Government is the result of a mercenary conspiracy on the part of a few adventurers and that a majority of the people of the Hawaiian Islands do not participate in it, he simply puts a hypothetical question, whether under the plainest principles of equitable jurisdiction it would be our duty as a great people to redress the wrong, if it had been committed, and restore the status quo.

When the papers come in answer to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts we shall know, I trust, what instructions were given to Mr. Willis. If it shall turn out that those instructions were to restore the Queen by armed force, no one will deprecate it and no one will resist the doctrine to any extremity more than myself.

I repeat that it would be an act of war; and it seems to me impossible that the Secretary of State and the President of the United States should have come to the conclusion that without the action of Congress they could do any such thing. But as I understand the position of the Administration now as given in the instructions to Mr. Blount, which I have read, it is simply a repetition and affirmation of the time-honored doctrine of our country in every Administration, that we should not interfere in the domestic affairs of other people, but content ourselves with the plain right of every nation to protect the property and persons of its citizens who are residing in a foreign country for legitimate ends.
